Vancouver federation turns to endowment funds

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — While personal contact is still a favored way for fundraisers to canvass, endowment funds are playing an increasingly important role, especially for securing long-term funding.

The Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV) has waged an effective campaign for endowment giving and in only five years, has accumulated total assets of over $4.5 million, plus additional commitments of $5 million, according to a report from Janice Loomer Margolis, director of the federation's endowment fund.

Only the income generated is available for distribution to fund specifically designated areas of service or special new programs, says Margolis.

When appropriate, she adds, endowment programs can be named in honor of the donor "or in honor of someone you love."

To encourage endowment giving, Wolfe Goodman, one of Canada's foremost tax experts, spoke to over 100 prospects and financial experts at a recent luncheon meeting at the Four Seasons Hotel.

Goodman, a partner in the Toronto law firm of Goodman and Carr; offered advice for setting up various types of endowments and bequests and stressed their tax benefits.

Goodman noted that in the 1996 federal budget, the government, perhaps recognizing the problems created for charities by its drastic cutbacks, has eased the relief available to charitable donors. The amount a donor can claim has been increased from 20 percent of taxable income for the year to 50 percent plus an additional 50 percent of taxable capital gains arising in respect of charitable gifts made in the year.

He said previous tax regulations were "a very expensive way to make a charitable gift."

In a memo prepared for The CJN, Margolis reported three tax changes "which will have positive impacts in situations where major donations are considered."

First, as noted, the limit of tax credits for a taxpayer's annual donations to charities increases. A five-year carry forward for unused receipts has been retained.

Secondly, in the year of death, tax credits may be used to offset up to 100 percent of taxable income. Unused credits can be carried back one year, again with the 100 percent limitation.

The third, "and perhaps most significant change," said Margolis, will be raising the limit to 100 percent on the portion of a donation of appreciated property that must be included in the donor's taxable income. The full amount of the gain which arises on making the gift is sheltered from tax by the charitable receipt. In addition, as the receipt will be higher than the taxable gain, this amount can be used to shelter other income from taxation, either in the year of the gift or in the five subsequent years.

Goodman also discussed the feasibility of elderly people and others donating capital to charity via annuities. Some organizations have their own annuity program, while others purchase gift annuities from an insurance company.

Goodman says another group of potential donors consists of professional or salaried people, who may be higher income earners but have only modest amounts of capital. To protect their families in case of death, these people can give what they wish to charity through life insurance. The most common arrangement is to have the charity named as owner and beneficiary of a policy; or an existing policy can be assigned to a charity. If the existing policy has cash value, the donor gets a tax receipt for the value of the policy. Payments of premium by the donor is regarded as a gift to charity for tax purposes.

Thus, for modest premiums for which the individual gets tax credits, "he or she can provide a handsome endowment for charity, without reducing capital."

Business people, Goodman said, are frequently prevented by the cash needs of their businesses from making large gifts in cash or securities.

"In my view," he said, "an attractive method for principals in a closely held business involves use of their shareholder's loan account — acquired bonuses that are loaned back to the company."

Using this system, the individual may convert the loan to an interest-bearing promissory note that is often gifted to a charity. The charity will issue a tax receipt for the value of the note to the individual. The individual arranges for the company to buy a life insurance policy on his life. The company will pay interest annually on the loan, which it may deduct from the operating income. (These interest payments may be characterized as the individual's annual gift to the charity.)

On the death of the individual, the company receives the tax free proceeds from the insurance policy, which it uses to repay the promissory note.

For more information about the many ways to donate with maximum tax benefits, in the Vancouver area you can contact Janice Loomer Margolis at the JFGV, fax 604-257-5110, or call her at 604-257-5100. In other Canadian centres where endowment funds have been established, consult your local federation office.

Court's decision, the government acted in accord with Canadians' sense of justice," said Irving Abella, chair of the Congress war crimes committee. "It is unthinkable to allow men suspected of being involved in some of the worst crimes in the annals of human history to enjoy the fruits of Canadian citizenship and escape justice without a full hearing of the allegations. We hope the Federal Court of Appeal will agree. Justice demands no less."

In other developments, the Simon Wiesenthal Centre called on Rock to appoint a committee to review the Justice Department's poor record on war crimes prosecutions.

"It is hard to conceive that any other department would have such a sorry record, such a long list of failures, so many delays and blunders, without facing an intensive review of its personnel and procedures. Something has clearly gone seriously wrong," Littman stated in a letter to Rock.

Littman suggested the review be conducted by a committee of lawyers and judges from outside the Justice Department.

"The government can't be held accountable for 50 years of history, all the things that Littman is concerned about. I think the government's record has been clear," Simms said referring to the January '95 announcement. "We're well on the way to meet that [target]."

Since January 1995, "there has been a determined effort" to bring alleged war criminals to justice, he added.

Sims said federal lawyers were hoping to receive judicial direction on various complex legal issues before proceeding with other cases. That direction is needed "so as not to go down the wrong path."

Since 1986, when the Deschenes Commission reported on Nazi war criminals living in Canada, federal authorities have succeeded in only one case involving someone residing in Canada: Former Dutch Nazi collaborator Jacob Luitjens was deported to Holland. All other criminal prosecutions and citizenship revocation cases have failed, although Arthur Rudolph, a former Nazi rocket scientist and U.S. citizen, was ordered removed from Canada after a deportation hearing.

News Roundup

JNF Elections Held

VANCOUVER — Bill Gruenthal has been elected president of the Jewish National Fund (JNF) Pacific region, succeeding Ruth Freeman.

In her presidential report, Freeman said the region has been very productive in the past two years. A highlight of her term of office, she said, was the first ever kosher Negev dinner held at the Empress Hotel in Victoria.

The Jerusalem 3000 program resulted in increased contributions to the JNF, she said, and the Okanagan community raised funds for Jerusalem 3000 for the Okanagan Grove in the B.C. Forest in Israel.

Other officers elected were Sanford Cohen, Michael Cohene, Dr. Monte Glanzberg, vice-presidents; Bonnie Belzberg, treasurer; Harvey Dales, secretary.

Kotler Heads OJC

KELOWNA — Mel Kotler was elected president of the Okanagan Jewish Community (OJC) at the recent annual meeting.

"We were worried about our ability to fill the executive slate for the upcoming year to deal with diminishing involvement," said Kotler, who was one of the founders of the OJC. "But after considerable soul-searching we resolved matters in a positive way, with the membership pledging to become more involved."

Multifaith Group Meets

WHITE ROCK, B.C. — "We have to try and understand each other better because it is a very small world we live in," said Marilyn Berger, associate director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, at a recent meeting in White Rock of the Semiahmoo Peninsula Multifaith Action group.

The alternative is "causeless hatred which petrifies the heart and becomes organized malice," Berger said.

Multifaith work is one way of bridging the boundaries that separate communities, in order to create friendship and understanding and weaken the grip of blind prejudice she said.

"But the goal must be to meet each other respectfully and not try to convert one another."

The Semiahmoo group was formed in late May in response to a perceived need for dialogue along religious lines. The group hopes to bring together community religious leaders in the South Surrey/White Rock area, and plans to celebrate multicultural religious festivities with the wider public.

Human Rights Coalition

YAHK, B.C. — The Creston Valley Human Rights Coalition was formed earlier this year to deal with racist problems, human rights education and anti-racism awareness in this mountain region, according to Peter Ashmore, the coalition coordinator.

Creston Valley, deep in the heart of the Rockies, is close to the border with Idaho, a U.S. state known, Ashmore said, as a hot bed of racism whose ideas have filtered across the border to British Columbia.

The coalition is a loosely organized group, Helena White, publisher of the twice-weekly Creston Valley Advance, told The CJN. She said advice for its organization was received from David Lethbridge, head of the Salmon Arm Coalition Against Racism.

"We plan to work with schools, churches, businesses, unions, youth groups and others to make our communities safe and inclusive places," Ashmore said.

Jerusalem Prize Awarded

WINNIPEG — Theresa Rosenberg was recently presented with the Jerusalem Prize, in recognition of her work on behalf of the State of Israel.

The presentation was made by the Canadian Zionist Federation at the Jewish National Fund's annual Negev Dinner here, which this year drew 1,200 people, making it once again one of the most successful Negev Dinner fundraisers in Canada.

Rosenberg has been a lifelong activist on behalf of Israel. As she noted in her thank you speech, Winnipeg has a long history of Zionist activity.

"My family was deeply involved," she said. "It was only natural that I followed their example. To this day, my love for Israel and the Jewish people is an unquenchable flame. I hope all the energy that I and my husband Murray have devoted to Israel will be carried on by our children and grandchildren.

Rosenberg described the presentation of the Jerusalem Prize and the recognition of her peers as a pinnacle in her career, in her work for Israel, and a milestone in her life. — Myron Love

Hadassah Honors Cohen

This year's honoree was Raye Cohen, named Woman of the Year for her close to 50 years of dedication to Hadassah-WIZO.

Known here as Ms. Hadassah-WIZO Bazaar, Cohen, a native of New York City, began helping out whenever she came to visit her aunt, Helen Schwartz.

In 1945, she came to Hamilton as a landed immigrant, because she told The CJN, "my mother made me." Her brother, Sam Stolman, was already living here and it turned out to be, Cohen said, "the best move I ever made." She married a Hamiltonian, the late Berman Cohen, and before long, she was an active member of Hadassah-WIZO.

She was instrumental in forming the Tzipah Paikin chapter, named after another aunt who was active in the organization, and served as its president for over 12 years.

But most of all, Cohen worked on the bazaar. Every room in her house would be filled with donations to the bazaar and though she now lives in an apartment, the spare room is still filled with bazaar items.

Also recognized for 50 years of dedicated service was the Henrietta Szold chapter. Council president, Lila Strub, who will serve another term, gave the year-end report. — Moura Wolpert

Dingwall hands out Canada Volunteer Awards

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dan Shapiro, who has helped raise $4 million to fight diseases affecting his children and thousands of other Canadians; and Raylene Godel, a breast cancer survivor who visits and encourages others with the illness, are among 23 winners of the Canada Volunteer Award.

Karen, daughter of Dan and Elaine Shaprio, was diagnosed in 1982 with colitis, a form of inflammatory bowel disease.

"We nearly lost her at that time. Her veins were collapsing and it was only an astute diagnosis that saved her," said Shapiro. "We didn't even know what colitis was then. She is in reasonably good health now and is expecting a baby."

Their son, Robert, was diagnosed in 1985 with Crohn's disease, another inflammatory bowel condition. Now on a strict diet, he is in good health.

Two of Elaine Shapiro's sisters are also afflicted with colitis.

In 1982, Dan Shapiro launched the annual Awards Dinner of the Crohn's and Colitis Foundation of Canada. Besides overseeing the event, he personally sells 1,000 tickets for it each year. The foundation, with help from food industry executives, has raised $4 million for medical research.

Cancer conferences

In addition, as senior vice-president of Loblaws Companies, Shapiro began to sell Christmas cakes for the foundation and has raised $1.5 million so far.

Shapiro, a volunteer with the Lyndhurst Foundation, Variety Village and Ronald McDonald House, has also raised funds for Canadian Friends of Hebrew University.

Since 1982, Godel has educated and inspired others through the Canadian Cancer Society, especially the Reach to Recovery Program. Her efforts have given Ontario patients and families a voice in cancer care decisions.

She has participated in international cancer conferences, is involved in planning the Ontario Breast Screening Program at Toronto Centre, and is a regional contact for the Canadian Breast Cancer Network. She helped revise the booklet What You Need to Know about Breast Cancer and works with Breast Cancer Action, Ottawa, to help distribute information on lymphedema. She also visits newly diagnosed breast cancer patients.

Gene therapy used on brain tumor

By JUDY SIEGEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – For the first time here, a 50-year-old woman suffering from a brain tumor is being treated with gene therapy.

The woman had the genetic material inserted at Tel Hashomer's Sheba Hospital, which is participating in international clinical trials. She had surgery seven months ago to remove the tumor and underwent radiotherapy. But a month ago a second brain tumor was discovered. Now doctors are hoping that gene therapy will help her.

The clinical experiment was initially carried out by the U.S. National Institutes of Health and coordinated by Dr. Zvi Ram, who has since returned to Sheba's neurosurgery department.

The treatment is based on the fact that brain cells do not ordinarily divide, but only the cancer cells do.

There are viruses that attack only cells that divide.

Thus by using genetic engineering techniques, cells carrying the herpes virus are injected into the tumor and only infect the cancer cells. The cells are then destroyed by an anti-herpes drug.

ODA VICE-PRESIDENT

Dr. Wayne Pulver, an endodontist from Willowdale, has been elected vice-president of the Ontario Dental Association (ODA). He will become president of the association in 1998. Dr. Pulver has extensive background in organized dentistry and has held leadership positions in numerous dental organizations. Dr. Pulver is a member of Holy Blossom Temple and Toronto Freedman Lodge B'nai Brith.

Netanyahu speech sets new direction for peace

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Ovation for undivided Jerusalem

WASHINGTON – If one were in an Arab capital watching Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's televised speech to Congress last week, a searing impression would be the legislators' standing ovation in response to his call never to redivide Jerusalem.

Opinion

The image of the entire Congress standing and cheering as Netanyahu said the city would stay under Israeli sovereignty will probably be replayed on TV news shows in the Arab world. This will make it clear that isolating Israel on Jerusalem is not as simple as passing resolutions at an Arab summit.

Another part of the message Arab leaders will not like was Netanyahu's vision of a "new Middle East" that puts democracy, not economics, front and centre in the peace process.

It remains unclear whether this will guide Netanyahu in practice or was merely a rhetorical flourish that was meant to play well with his American audience.

Indeed, part of Netanyahu's appeal to Congress was his ability to wrap his message in terms of values held dear by Americans – self-reliance, freedom, justice and human rights – and his claim that Israel is not against Islam.

Netanyahu also touched on another point sensitive to the Arabs. While he has hammered home his watchword of "reciprocity," making it palpably clear what he expects from the Arab side, he refused to say what Israel would give in return assuming his terms were met. He would only say that at that point, he would be willing to negotiate a final-status agreement, as mandated by the Oslo accords.

Finally, while Netanyahu won warm applause for his important, albeit qualified promise to "begin the long-term process of gradually reducing" foreign aid, Egypt is likely to view the move as putting political pressure upon it. U.S. assistance to Cairo only passes in Congress because of its ties with Israel and the efforts of the pro-Israel community.

The idea of democratizing the Arab world, however, is bound to be the one point of Netanyahu's speech which will draw the most scrutiny in Arab capitals. It marked a major departure for Israeli leaders, even if its operational significance remains unclear.

While its appeal may resonate in some key quarters of Arab public opinion – for example, among Palestinians who deeply want some check on Yasser Arafat's authority – it won't be applauded by the very leaders whose cooperation Israel needs for any future agreements.

Calling democracy a pillar of Middle East peacemaking is something Yitzhak Rabin consistently opposed. Whenever Rabin was asked about the topic, he would flick his wrist and say: "I am not [Hanan] Ashrawi." He would then say that he did not care what Arafat did internally, as long as he curbed terrorism.

Netanyahu expressed philosophical disagreement with this position when he said: "States that respect the human rights of their citizens are not likely to provoke hostile action against their neighbors."

But how will Netanyahu implement this pillar of peacemaking? One Arab diplomat said after the speech that Netanyahu's remarks were merely "justifying his inability to move forward."

Even Netanyahu admitted that "this doesn't mean that we cannot have peace in the region now, peace with non-democratic regimes. I believe we can. It's a fact that we've had such peace agreements."

The Labor government believed that the best hope for political moderation rested with economic progress. Netanyahu, however, made no mention of economics as a key to peace.

Hungarian restitution accord may be model for other nations

By AGNES BOHM
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUDAPEST – An agreement reached last week with the Hungarian government is being hailed as a breakthrough in efforts to obtain restitution for property seized during the Holocaust.

The agreement "is a model for all other countries in the region," said Gusztav Zoltai, executive director of the Hungarian Jewish community.

"This is a landmark event," said Israel Singer, chair of the World Jewish Restitution Organization (WJRO), which joined local Jewish leaders in negotiating the agreement with the Hungarian government. "This establishes the precedent by which the other countries with whom we are negotiating can arrive at an agreement."

As a result of discussions that concluded July 3, the agreement establishes a Hungarian Jewish Heritage Foundation to be headed by a board of directors that will include local and international Jewish leaders, Hungarian government officials and independent members.

The foundation, expected to be set up before the end of the year, will manage Jewish-owned communal properties that will be returned to the community under the terms of the agreement. The properties include synagogues and old age homes, which will be put to direct use by the community, as well as commercial real estate and art treasures.

The foundation will also manage the disbursement of millions of dollars contributed by the Hungarian government.

The agreement did not call for the restitution of personal properties, even if the owners or descendants could be found.

The foundation will be headed by Ronald Lauder, treasurer of the World Jewish Congress. Lauder has been active in Jewish renewal projects in eastern and central Europe through the foundation that bears his name.

The agreement calls for the issuance of compensation coupons, or vouchers, from which annuities will be paid to needy Holocaust survivors.

The Hungarian government provided seed money of about $27 million for the voucher program.

Additional funding will come from income derived from the communal properties being managed by the foundation, Singer said.

Some 16,000 to 18,000 Holocaust survivors will get a monthly pension of $40 from the vouchers, Zoltai said.

Hungary had a pre-war population of 800,000 Jews, about 600,000 of whom died in death or labor camps under the Nazis.

The Hungarian Jewish community, which now numbers between 80,000 and 130,000, is the largest in central Europe.

According to the agreement, only those Jews who live in Hungary will get the pension from the foundation.

Establishment of the foundation must still be confirmed by the Hungarian parliament when it reconvenes in September.

Although the foundation is expected to be hotly debated by parliamentarians, the local Jewish leadership expects that it will be approved.

Since its founding as an affiliate of the World Jewish Congress four years ago, the WJRO has been negotiating the restitution issue with Hungary and other countries in eastern and central Europe. Singer said ongoing negotiations with Romania, Slovakia and Bulgaria are proceeding along similar lines to the agreement reached with Hungary.

The talks are making "significant progress," but no agreements with those countries have yet been reached, he said, adding that the accord with Budapest "stands in marked contrast with the non-cooperation we have been receiving from Poland and the Czech Republic."

In the negotiations with those two countries, Singer said, "we have simply been stonewalled."

Israel developing a missile defence

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Israel, having learned the bitter lessons of war, has embarked upon a crash program to develop a comprehensive defence shield against incoming enemy missiles.

By all accounts, Israel is well on its way toward realizing its objective.

• The Arrow anti-missile system, which is designed to destroy missiles fired from more than 300 kilometres away, should be fully operational by the turn of the millennium.

• The Nautilus anti-missile laser system, which is supposed to intercept short-range rockets of the kind launched by Hezbollah over the past few years and most recently in April, will probably be available for testing by late 1997.

With the financial and technical help of the United States, Israel is investing a fortune in missile technology because it has no choice. The Arab world is bristling with missiles.

In the wake of the Six Day War, the major Arab states — Egypt, Syria and Iraq — decided to level the playing field by expanding their respective missile forces. During the 1968-70 War of Attrition and the 1973 Yom Kippur War, Arab armies deployed surface-to-air missiles with deadly effect. And in the 1991 Gulf War, Iraq fired 39 Scud missiles at Israel, causing widespread property damage.

In the face of Iraq's aggression, the United States rushed Patriot missile batteries to Israel. The Patriots raised Israel's sagging morale. In purely military terms, however, the Patriots were largely ineffective because they are meant to defend air fields rather than cities.

When the Gulf War broke out, Israel was unable to deploy the Arrow, because it was not yet operational. Israel began work on the Arrow in 1986 and tested the first prototype shortly after Iraq invaded Kuwait in August 1990.

Since then, Israel has tested the Arrow, including the latest Arrow-2 model, eight times. Last tested five months ago, the Arrow program will cost approximately $1.3 billion (US).

The United States has poured $450 million into the project. Last January, U.S. Secretary of Defence William Perry kicked in another $200 million.

Being interested in building a missile defence system of its own, Washington has a vital stake in the success of the Arrow. In the past 13 years, the United States has spent close to $40 billion in pursuing this goal. The Clinton administration reportedly plans to allocate about $3 billion on research and development programs in 1997.

The Nautilus system, an offshoot of the Reagan administration's Strategic Defence Initiative (Star Wars), is in an early stage of development. It is the smallest of the anti-missile programs the Americans are working on at present.

Facing a Katyusha rocket threat from Hezbollah guerrillas in southern Lebanon, Israel has asked the United States to speed up the Nautilus program, and offered to invest $20 million in it.

Washington has complied with Israel's wishes. On April 29, Israel and the United States signed a missile defence agreement in Jerusalem. David Ivry, director-general of Israel's Ministry of Defence, laid the groundwork for the accord when he visited Washington in mid-April.

Israel expects great results from the Nautilus, which is also capable of intercepting mortars and unmanned reconnaissance vehicles.

Should the Nautilus prove itself in battle, Hezbollah will have to reassess its tactics.

In addition to the Arrow and the Nautilus, Israel is striving to perfect the Ofek-3, which has been described as its first spy satellite. Launched in April 1995 following successful tests of the Ofek-1 and the Ofek-2 in 1988 and 1990, the Ofek-3, in official Israeli parlance, is "an experimental satellite intended for scientific and technological purposes."

In reality, as observers have noted, the Ofek-3 is designed to enhance Israel's ability to survey countries such as Syria, Iraq and Iran, and to provide sufficient response time to a hostile incoming missile.

Launched from a three-stage Shavit rocket, the Ofek-3 can relay accurate information to ground stations in almost any weather.

Israel hopes that the Ofek-3 will be able to transmit "real-time" photographs and data, which the United States withheld in the early phases of the Gulf War. This was apparently the reason why Israel developed the Ofek-3.

Israel's Arab neighbors claim that the Ofek-3 may aggravate tensions in the region, and surprisingly, the United States agrees.

Recently, John Deutsch, head of the Central Intelligence Agency, discussed this matter with David Ivry. According to reports, they failed to bridge their differences.

But Washington's displeasure with the Ofek-3 is unlikely to affect its partnership with Israel in the joint development of the Arrow and Nautilus anti-missile systems.

July 8

• The Association for Civil Rights in Israel unveiled an assessment of human rights in Israel. The 260-page report, known as Israel Human Rights Focus 1996, found that "Israel basically respects the human rights of its citizens," but that the rights of Arab residents of the West Bank and Gaza "are violated often and widely."

• Archeologists reportedly discovered the remains of a 2,000-year-old clay wine jug inscribed with the name of King Herod, along with evidence of daily life at Massada during Herod's time. The Latin inscription says either "Herod, King of Judea" or "Herod, King of the Jews."

July 9

• The government announced that Eliahu Ben-Elissar will be Israel's next ambassador to the United States, replacing Itamar Rabinovitch in September. Ben-Elissar's seat in the Knesset will be taken by Ruby Rivlin.

July 10

July 11

• Foreign Minister David Levy was reported in the media as saying he would meet with Yasser Arafat within two weeks. He also stated that a solution to redeployment in Hebron would soon be finalized and made public.

July 12

• Yediot Aharonot reported that Prime Minister Bejamin Netanyahu will meet next week with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak in Cairo. The prime minister will brief Mubarak about plans to implement agreements with the Palestinians.

Temple Mount worship supported

By BILL HUTMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Justice Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman has expressed support for permitting Jewish worship at the Temple Mount, long forbidden for security reasons, and vowed that his ministry will provide the legal support for the move, according to MK Hanan Porat (National Religious Party).

Porat said he met with Ne'eman recently on the issue and that he hoped to meet with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to expedite a change in the policy that has allowed only Muslim worship at the site since 1967.

"Ne'eman expressed his strong support for making the arrangements necessary to allow Jews to worship on the Temple Mount," Porat said.

According to Porat, Ne'eman said he needed time at the ministry to deal with other pressing issues before officially addressing the matter of Jewish prayer on the Temple Mount. Ne'eman promised the ministry would support the move in principle, Porat said.

"I tried to press him about a timetable, but he wouldn't make any promises about when things would happen," Porat said.

Porat added that he is organizing a meeting of various groups and people who want to push for allowing Jewish worship on the Temple Mount, and that there are plans for protests on Tisha b'Av, the anniversary of the Temple's destruction.

Terrorist attack foiled

By ELDAD BECK
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

PARIS – French security forces prevented a terrorist attack on a Jewish school here last week, and arrested several people suspected of involvement.

Last Wednesday morning, a car bomb was discovered by French security agents next to Chabad's Or Yosef school at a time when 300 to 400 children were in the building. The bomb was neutralized.

"The car was parked next to the school for several days, but the school's guards didn't notice it," an Or Yosef employee said. "The police closed the gates, not letting anyone out, and exploded the car."

Security sources in Paris said the French police had arrested several suspects of North African origin.

It is not clear whether the planned attack was directly connected to the Arab-Israeli conflict or with Algerian fundamentalist groups that last summer committed several bombings all over France.

One of the targets last summer was the Jewish school in Lyon. Thirteen pupils were slightly wounded when a car bomb exploded in a street next to the school.

Turkey likely to keep defence ties with Israel

BY DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

LONDON – Necmettin Erbakan, the first Islamist prime minister of modern Turkey, is expected to reduce the visibility of Ankara's relationship with Israel, but keep the military cooperation agreement intact, according to the chief columnist of the Islamist daily Zaman.

Islamic PM likely to disappoint Syrian president

Interviewed by the London-based daily newsletter Mideast Mirror, Fehmi Koru said Erbakan's government might impose cosmetic changes to make Turkey's relations with Israel less transparent.

However, he is unlikely to threaten the military relationship, if only because former premier Tansu Ciller made this, as well as adherence to other agreements, a condition of entering a coalition agreement with his Islamic Welfare party.

At the same time, Koru said, Erbakan is likely to disappoint the expectations of some of his neighbors, including Syrian President Hafez al-Assad, who sent him a warm cable congratulating him on coming to power and hoping for an improvement in relations. Syrian-Turkish ties have been strained in recent months because of a long-standing water dispute and because of Syrian support for the anti-Turkish PKK Kurdish movement, which is based in Damascus and trains under Syrian auspices in both Syria and the Syrian-controlled Bekaa Valley of east Lebanon.

He said Arab countries would soon begin coordinating their response to Netanyahu's remarks.

In Cairo, the Arab League secretariat said Netanyahu's speech before Congress only served to increase tension and violence in the region.

Esmat Abdel-Meguid, secretary-general of the 22-nation Arab League, described Netanyahu's speech as a "flagrant challenge to the resolutions of international diplomacy."

Netanyahu, meanwhile, was expected to travel to Egypt and Jordan this week to discuss his positions with the leaders of the two nations.

A senior Egyptian official was quoted as saying that Netanyahu would make a brief trip to Cairo for talks with President Hosni Mubarak and Foreign Minister Amre Moussa.

Jordanian Prime Minister Abdul Karim al-Kabariti told a news conference in Amman that the Israeli leader would visit next week.

In Jerusalem, Foreign Minister David Levy said he would meet with Arafat within two weeks, adding that Netanyahu might meet with the Palestinian leader even sooner.

In a separate development, Science Minister Ze'ev "Benny" Begin met last week with the Egyptian ambassador to Israel, Mohammed Basiouny, in Jerusalem.

Begin said after the meeting that the two had discussed the peace process, but he refused to elaborate.

He added that he was working on a plan to forge closer technological ties between the two countries.

IDF chief critical of budget cuts

By LIAT COLLINS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Amnon Shahak spoke out strongly last week against the proposed budget cuts, telling the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee the IDF is facing "a deep crisis of confidence which could have a very negative effect."

Shahak said there is a feeling in the career army that they have become a target for the Finance Ministry.

"In no other sector have wages been harmed, but the Finance Ministry knows that we can't strike and that we don't have personal contracts," Shahak said in an official briefing. "I usually sit in on cabinet meetings and hear how good things are and about the growth [in the economy] and suddenly [I] hear about how bad it is and how the military has to cut NIS 825 million ($275 million US).

"The defence budget has been dropping for several years but now it is significantly low," he said.

"The IDF will do what it can to to ensure maximum security, but the IDF's multi-year plan no longer exists," he added. "I have to stop projects because I can't complete them."

Focusing on the proposed cuts of wages and benefits for the career army, Shahak said that since the cuts were proposed, 10 officers in the communication corps and scores of officers in the computers and programming branch have asked to leave. Many officers have asked to forgo vacation days owed them in order to quit immediately and some 200 IDF pensioners have asked to receive their pensions now as a lump sum.

He said many of the cuts would be felt by officers when they demobilize. As an example, a major leaving the army will lose some NIS 100,000 ($33,000 US) if the cuts go through.

Shahak also told the committee members that Syria is not preventing the transfer of weapons from Iran to Hezbollah via its territory.

He said Hezbollah had recently received a large quantity of arms, including improved Katyushas, via Damascus. The weapons include Iranian-produced 240-millimetre rocket-like devices and a larger capacity for explosives, but it has not been definitely confirmed that they have reached the field.

According to Shahak, Hezbollah is going back to its original aims: to bring about the collapse of the South Lebanese Army (SLA) and make things as difficult as possible for the IDF in south Lebanon. He painted a bleak picture of the situation within the SLA because of the uncertainty and problems in mobilizing recruits.

A senior IDF intelligence officer also told the committee that Hezbollah "is returning to its old patterns: fewer shells and more in-depth attacks and attacks on outposts." Yet the officer said he expects a certain level of calm in south Lebanon because of the upcoming Lebanese elections.

Sephardi Chief Rabbi sermon called an incitement to kill

By DEBRA NUSSBAUM COHEN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK – Israel's Sephardi Chief Rabbi Eliahu Bakshi-Doron made remarks last week that have sparked sharp responses from the leaders of the Reform movement and from a group of Orthodox Jews who support the peace process.

Rabbi Uri Regev, director of the Reform movement's Israel Religious Action Centre, said Rabbi Bakshi-Doron's sermon could be viewed as a licence to kill Reform Jews in much the same way the convicted assassin of Yitzhak Rabin cited justification in Jewish law for his violent act.

Rabbi Regev sent letters last week to Israel's attorney general and to the police department's chief investigator asking them to conduct a criminal inquiry.

He also wrote separate letters to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who serves as Israel's minister of religious affairs, and to Israel's Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau, who also heads the chief rabbinic council, asking for Rabbi Bakshi-Doron to be removed as Sephardi chief rabbi and as head of the country's highest rabbinic court of appeals.

Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the Reform movement's Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC), also called upon Netanyahu to condemn the remarks attributed to Rabbi Bakshi-Doron.

In the meantime, Ma'ariv reported last week that the office of the Sephardi Chief Rabbinate had issued a statement saying that Rabbi Bakshi-Doron's sermon had been misinterpreted.

In a sermon about the Torah portion of the week at Jerusalem's Tifereth Yerushalayim Synagogue, Rabbi Bakshi-Doron compared the biblical figure Zimri to the Reform movement of today.

He praised Pinchas, the man who murdered Zimri for having sexual relations with a Midianite woman. According to the Torah passage, Pinchas had put an end to an epidemic as a result of his act.

Rabbi Bakshi-Doron said during his sermon that killing is prohibited "without witnesses, without warning, without a Sanhedrin," the supreme religious court that cannot be convened in the absence of the Temple in Jerusalem.

But he also indicated that even so awful an act as murder could be sometimes be considered meritorious if it spares the Jewish people from a greater harm.

Rabbi Regev said his office has been receiving "threatening phone calls and faxes that leave very little doubt of the senders' intentions.

The head of Shvil Hazahav (The Golden Path), an organization which represents Orthodox Jews who support the peace process, also expressed concerns about Rabbi Bakshi-Doron's language.

"If what was reported to have been said by the rabbi is true, it could be viewed as incitement similar to those words which were reported to have precipitated the action by an extremist 'religious' Jew last November," said Rabbi Shmuel Goldin, chair of Shvil Hazahav.

At the same time,Rabbi Avi Shafran, Director of Public Affairs for Agudath Israel of America, has accused Reform leaders of overreacting to the chief rabbi's remarks.

In a prepared statement, Rabbi Avi Shafran described the Reform movement's interpretation of Rabbi Bakshi-Doron's sermon as a "self-serving misreading. Rabbis Regev and Yoffie know full well that no responsible Orthodox rabbi condones violence of any sort against Reform leaders; it is irresponsible for them to imply otherwise."

Citizen complaints up in Israel

By EVELYN GORDON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The number of citizen complaints against the government found justified by the state ombudsman is the highest in the Western world, ombudsman Miriam Ben-Porat said last week, when she submitted her annual report to the Knesset.

Of the 4,404 complaints on which the office issued a ruling last year, 37.2 percent were found justified, up slightly from the previous year's 35 percent.

"This is the highest [percentage] in the world," Ben-Porat told Knesset Speaker Dan Tichon, adding that in most of the Western world, "10 percent is considered a lot [of justified complaints]."

The number of complaints in Israel is also high, Ben-Porat said. In total, 7,782 complaints were filed last year, up about 11 percent from the previous year though since the reporting period is set according to the Jewish calendar, much of the increase can be accounted for by the extra month last year.

"There is a lot to fix with respect to public servants' treatment of people," Ben-Porat said. "In many cases, they don't want to hear what people are saying to them."

One of the main ways to fight this phenomenon is public awareness, she said, adding she was pleased that public awareness of her office's existence appears to be high.

Even though her office can only make recommendations, she added, "almost 100 percent of these recommendations are implemented," and if an organization refuses, she can ask the responsible minister to order it to do so. No minister has ever refused such a request, she said.

By far the greatest source of complaints continues to be the local authorities, the report noted. Ben-Porat received 1,627 complaints about local authorities last year, up from 1,347 the previous year, and 40 percent of those which her office finished dealing with were found to be justified.

Jerusalem was the most complained-about of the major municipalities, with 157 complaints, but Bnei Brak had the largest percentage of justified complaints: 18 of the 30 on which the office issued a ruling, or 60 percent.

In total, the office dealt with 8,361 complaints last year, of which 3,957 were closed without a ruling, either because the problem was resolved without the office's intervention, or because they were not within the office's legal purview.

Budget cuts first step in economic reform, Meridor says

By EVELYN GORDON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The planned 1997 budget cuts are only the first step in a broader program of economic reform, Israel's Finance Minister Dan Meridor told the Knesset finance committee last week.

"After this will come structural changes in order to create a better economy with a freer market," he said.

Meridor, who was explaining the budget reductions to the committee, stressed that they were not really cuts, since 1997's budget will still be bigger than that of 1996. However, the increase will be much smaller than what was originally planned.

Budget Follow-up

Meridor said the cuts were needed because Israel currently maintains a level of spending for health, education and welfare which is at Western European levels as a percentage of GNP, but of necessity couples this with defence spending which is much higher than European levels. The result is an overload on the budget.

The previous government, for example, increased education spending 70 percent in real terms, he noted. "The question is whether we can continue in this fashion," he said.

Other than cuts, there are three ways to deal with the problem – let the deficit grow, raise taxes or take out loans – but all would be irresponsible, he said. He noted that the 1996 budget deficit is already expected to hit NIS 11 billion ($4.7 billion Cdn.), or $1.29 billion more than originally planned.

"We decided not to raise taxes, not because we have pity on the rich, but because we know that this impedes growth," he added.

Opposition and coalition MKs alike raised numerous objections to the plan during the meeting, with the cuts in child allowances, the reduction of investment grants, the cancellation of the Demobilized Soldiers Law and the postponement of the long school day among the most frequently mentioned items.

However, most coalition MKs made it clear that though they would attempt to make changes, ultimately they would support the plan.

"If anyone thinks the coalition won't pass the government's proposal, it will pass it," said coalition whip Silvan Shalom (Likud). "In the end, the coalition will stand behind the government, both in the committee and in the plenum."

"Don't kid yourselves: The coalition will support the Treasury's policy," added Avraham Hirschson (Likud).

In response to the MKs' suggestions, Meridor expressed willingness to make certain changes, though he did not specify what.

"I don't expect the Knesset to be a rubber stamp," he said. "It would be very strange if it was, even if I would be happy [to have it so].

"Some [of your suggestions] don't seem reasonable to me, others do; and still others need to be looked into," he said. "But we will talk with each other and we will try to pass our proposals with as much of a consensus as possible."

One idea which he completely rejected, however, was reducing the government's participation in employers' national insurance payments.

"This is not the time to hurt companies whose profit margin is very small," he said.

Looking for financing capital?

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Many people on social assistance could be self-employed if they could get business loans, according to marketing specialist Stuart Weinstein, 29.

"There are many talented entrepreneurs. They would do well and succeed if they had capital," Weinstein says.

With partner Mary Ellen Koroscil, he recently set up the Mississauga-based company, Looking for Financing Capital Inc. Koroscil also runs a graphic arts and advertising company.

Looking for Financing Capital Inc. is a matchmaking service that links would-be entrepreneurs with business people. The company holds bi-monthly meetings which provide entrepreneurs with the opportunity to network with bankers, mortgage brokers, venture capitalists and other people with access to capital.

The open forums feature guest speakers such as Terry Smith of 640 Radio's Quest for Success, and draw an average of 40 to 50 people. According to Koroscil, nine matches have been made since the spring.

People on social assistance need to take the initiative to improve their lives, Weinstein says. "People are looking for jobs, but they're not looking at other options. They should consider becoming self-employed."

Weinstein met Koroscil through a Mississauga business network in January. He says the two discovered they shared the same philosophy about the need to promote more entrepreneurship, and shortly after that, they set up their company.

Six people attended their first meeting. By the third meeting in March, there were between 35 and 40 people. Plans are underway to start an extensive database of entrepreneurs and venture capitalists, as well as a mentoring system, because mentoring improves the rate of success Koroscil says.

Weinstein adds that the company will also be offering business skill courses for the new entrepreneurs. While government-run programs have similar goals, those programs tend to emphasize business skills rather than financing, he says.

Comedywood brings laughter to Vaughan

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – After 14 years of performing as a stage hypnotist in comedy clubs across North America, The Incredible Boris decided to build a stage for himself and other performers in the north-of-Toronto neighborhood where he grew up.

The result is Comedywood, a club at 800 Steeles Ave. W. in Vaughan that features comedy and variety acts six nights weekly.

"As a performer, I've never found enough stage time in Toronto," says Boris Cherniak, as he is known off the stage. "This is my way of giving back to the community and giving performers who are just starting out another stage to work on."

In its first six months, the 350-seat Comedywood Club has attracted a growing following who have come to hear such stand-up performers as Mark Price from TV's Family Ties, Dean Haglund from The X-files, comic Ralph May from Houston and many others who are less well-known but, in Cherniak's estimation, no less talented.

"We're working quite seriously on bringing in bigger-name acts, but it takes time," he says. "It seems that this place needs more work and more attention than a little baby."

The 32-year-old ex-Moscovite, who came to Canada in 1974, is not the only one tending to Comedywood. His partner, Doron Israeli, handles day-to-day operations, leaving Cherniak free to book the talent and still maintain his career as a stage hypnotist.

Family-rated comedy

"As a travelling performer, I do about 300 shows a year all over North America," he says. "This club came from my seeing all these different places and taking the best parts from all over."

Situated in the plaza on the northwest corner of Steeles and Bathurst, Comedywood offers shows Tuesdays through Sundays. Cover charges range from $5 to $12, dpending on the night. Reservations (905-761-0543) are recommended but not required.

Despite a trend towards X-ratedness in modern stand-up comedy, much of the entertainment at Comedywood is family-rated, Cherniak says. "That's the only thing I ask of my comedians. I will not censor them, but I ask them to keep it clean as far as the foul language goes."

On a recent Sunday evening, host Adam Powell performed a very funny skit about a visit to a sperm bank; Cherniak agrees that Powell's act would have been best appreciated by adults, as indeed it was by those in attendance.

"If a show is full of adult humor, we usually let people know in advance," he says. "But most of the time our shows are suitable for teenagers and anyone else."

One of the things people like best about Comedywood is the location, Cherniak says. "People can stay uptown in their own neighborhood. They don't have to drive downtown and pay for babysitting and parking. Now they can come right around the corner."

Does the club make a point of featuring Jewish humor to any degree? "Not really," Cherniak admits. "But we do have a mezuzah on our door."

IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF SHAKESPEARE

The play is again the thing in the Southwark district of London as a newly built replica of the Globe Theatre, where some of Shakespeare's most famous plays debuted almost 400 years ago, is set to open in late August for a three-week dramatic season.

Julius Caesar, As You Like It, Hamlet, Othello, King Lear, Macbeth and Romeo and Juliet are among the plays that were first performed here. Whichever plays are chosen for the Globe's reopening, they will supposedly be mounted as they were in Shakespeare's day. The theatre will be lit by natural means, all sound effects and music will be live and set design will be no more sophisticated than it was in the days when England's supreme bard supervised the production of his own plays here.

"Sweet" William Shakespeare of London, who made piles of money as an actor and earned only a pittance as a playwright, was a principal in the actor's syndicate that owned the circular, thatched-roof theatre when it opened in 1599 on the south bank of the Thames. The original structure burned down in 1613 after the thatched roof was ignited by a spark from a cannon fired during a performance of Henry V. It was quickly rebuilt and soon attained a reputation as the most renowned theatre in Elizabethan and Jacobean London. It was demolished in 1642.

To satisfy curious onlookers, a Shakespeare Muscum opened at the new Globe several years ago. Visitors may also take a short guided tour of the theatre. The cost is about $9 for adults, $7 for students and seniors, $5.50 for children. A stroll through the Southwark district takes in numerous other sites of significance to Shakespeare and other literary figures, as well as a colorful assortment of historic pubs, inns, churches and jails.

Between Blackfriar's and London bridges, one passes the former bullpits and brothels of the rough-and-tumble Elizabethans, the purported residence of architect Sir Christopher Wren when he supervised construction of St. Paul's Cathedral across the river, and the chimneys and church spires described by Charles Dickens, who spent his boyhood here.

In a nearby vacant lot lies part of the foundation of the original Globe. A bronze plaque on a fence shows a map of the district as it was known in Shakespeare's day. One also finds the original site of the Rose, a theatrical rival to the Globe. Soon after its discovery, it was measured by excited archeologists, then reburied beneath a new building.

The local Southwark Cathedral pays homage to its most famous parishioner through an alabaster reclining figure and colorful memorial windows which depict Hamlet, Falstaff and other characters. A plaque in the cathedral commemorates Edmund, the playwright's younger brother.

The nearby George Inn, dating from about 1676, is London's only surviving galleried coaching inn. With their spacious courtyards and balconies, such inns have been acknowledged as the crude forebears of theatres such as the Globe. Pedestrians also pass the ruins of the medieval Winchester Cathedral and the Clink Prison, the jailhouse that gave rise to the common expression "in the clink."

The Globe Theatre is situated near the Mansion House Underground Station, along the New Globe Walk, Bankside. Telephone, 071-928-6406. Historical Tours (0181-668-4019) offers an informative two-hour guided tour of Dickens' and Shakespeare's London for about $10. British Airways (416-250-0880) and other airlines offer daily flights to London.

Jewish athletes excelled at Olympics

Special to The CJN

ATLANTA — There's an old joke that tries to poke fun at the supposed Jewish aversion to sports — something about the smallest book ever written: Great Jewish Athletes.

However, the Atlanta Jewish Times (AJT) recently published a list of Jewish athletes who've won medals at the Olympic Games since 1896, and the list is extensive.

From 1896 to 1968, 131 Jews from 17 nations won 236 medals: 101 gold, 68 silver and 67 bronze. Since then, the list has increased considerably.

Hungary, Germany, Britain, the Soviet Union and the United States are among the top in medal count while the number of Canadian Jews capturing medals can be counted on the fingers of one hand.

Writing for the AJT, former boxer George Eisen noted that the inhabitants of East European shtetls at the turn of the century were not limited to the pursuit of spiritual goals.

"In these same shtetls, there were many Jewish shtarkes, or strongmen, such as porters, blacksmiths and farmers who protected the community during anti-Semitic disturbances," he writes.

One of them, Zisha Breitbart, "could tear chains with his bare hands, break coins between his fingers and lift huge weights with his teeth."

Other Jewish strongmen, particularly boxers, were not that rare in the early Games. The first heavyweight boxing champ was Sam Berger of the United States who won gold at the 1904 Games in St. Louis.

Between 1900 and 1910, more than 20 Olympic and world champions were Jewish.

At the 1896 games in Athens, Jews captured eight golds. Gymnast Alfred Flatow of Germany took home three and his teammate Gustav Felix Flatow (no relation) won two. Despite their success competing for Germany, both were killed in Nazi concentration camps.

Of all Olympic events, fencing may be the sport in which Jews reached their greatest success. Jews won more medals in Olympic fencing — based on their representation in the general population — in the first half of the 20th century than any other ethnic group. Hungarian Jewish fencers were especially dominant in the Olympics, winning 20 medals.

The roots of the Jewish fascination with the science of the sword may be attributed to the community's desire to identify with, and be accepted by, the upper classes. Fencing was an aristocratic pursuit that had been closed to Jews for hundreds of years.

The performance of some Jews has been out of the ordinary, even at the Olympic level. Gymnast Agnes Keleti of Hungary amassed nine medals in the 1952 and '56 games. Keleti, a Holocaust survivor, defected from the Melbourne Olympiad after the revolution in Hungary and made aliyah to Israel, becoming its national coach.

Irena Kirszenstein-Szewinska of Poland won medals in each of the first four Olympics in which she competed. She won a gold in the 200-metre race at the '68 Games, setting a new world record of 22.5 seconds. At the '76 Montreal games, she won the 400-metre race in a world record time of 49.29. It was her seventh Olympic medal, three of them gold.

Mark Spitz of the United States is remembered for his remarkable seven-gold performance in swimming at the 1972 Munich Olympics, setting a new world record in each event. At the '68 Olympics in Mexico City he won two golds as part of the U.S. freestyle swimming relay team as well as an individual silver in the 100-metre butterfly.

Ivan Osiier, from Copenhagen, Denmark, holds the record for participating in seven Olympic Games, more than any other athlete, and winning a silver at the 1912 Stockholm games.

Among those winning Olympic hardware for Canada were gold-medalist Albert Schneider (he was a U.S. citizen) in welterweight boxing at the 1920 Antwerp games; Montgomery "Moe" Herscovitch, a bronze medalist in middleweight boxing at the 1920 games; Fanny Rosenfeld, gold medalist in the 400-metre relay and silver medalist in the 100-metre dash at the '28 Amsterdam games; Irving Maretzky, silver medalist as a member of the '36 Canadian basketball team; Mark Berger, a bronze in judo at the 1984 Los Angeles games. Berger is from the former Soviet Union.

Another noteworthy Olympian is Vladimir Myshkin, former goalie with the Soviet national hockey team who won a silver at the '80 Lake Placid winter games when the Soviets were upset by the United States in the Miracle on Ice.

At the '92 Barcelona games, several Jews took home medals. Golds went to: Joseph Jacobi (U.S.A.) in canoeing; Dara Torres (U.S.A.) in swimming; and Valeri Belenki (Unified Team) in gymnastics.

Yael Arad of Israel won the Jewish state's first-ever Olympic medal with a silver in judo while Arbital Selinger (the Netherlands) also won silver in volleyball.

Arad's teammate, Oren Smadga, took home a bronze in judo while other third-place finishers included Belenki in gymnastics and Dan Greenbaum (U.S.A.) in volleyball.

Our best competitor

TORONTO — Perhaps the greatest Jewish athlete ever to wear Canada's colors was track and field star Fanny "Bobbie" Rosenfeld.

At the 1928 Olympics in Amsterdam, Rosenfeld won a gold medal as the lead-off runner in the 400-metre relay. She added a silver medal in the 100-metre sprint, the race that was so close that some Canadian partisans believed she'd beaten the U.S. runner, although there were no photo finishes at the time to dispute the official result.

In 1950, she was named Canada's female athlete of the half-century.

Rosenfeld was born in Katrinaslov, Russia in 1903 and her family moved to Barrie, Ont. when she was still a baby. As a teen, she began to show exceptional talent in track. She was known for giving competitors a three-yard headstart in the 100-yard dash and still beating them convincingly.

In 1922, the family moved to Toronto and by the mid-'20s, Rosenfeld had won Canadian titles in track and field and set national records. In 1925, she set the world record of 11 seconds in the 100-yard dash.

At the 1925 Ontario Ladies Track and Field Championships, she won the discus, 220-yard dash, low hurdles and long jump, while finishing second in the 100-yard dash and javelin. In 1924, she won the Toronto Ladies Grass Court Tennis Title.

After the Amsterdam Olympics, Rosenfeld played softball and hockey until she contracted severe arthritis. In the spring of 1937, she embarked on a new career, writing a column, Feminine Sports Reel, for the Globe and Mail.

She got the nickname "Bobbie" because she used to "bob" her hair so it wouldn't interfere in sports.

Rosenfeld died in 1969.

About jobs

Dear Lisa,

Yesterday, I had an interview and I think it went well. But there are so many things I'm not sure about. What should I have said about salary expectations, starting dates and family responsibilities?

Dear Reader,

All interviews are different, but generally if you think the interview went well, it probably did. Before you forget, drop the interviewer a line to let him or her know how grateful you are for the appointment.

Start by thanking the person for the interview and mention the position for which you were interviewed. Let the interviewer know that because of the knowledge you now have about the position, you are even more interested in the job and believe you are the right candidate.

Say that you look forward to hearing from your interviewer in the next week, but if you don't, you would like to contact him or her. The letter can be handwritten or typed, but the envelope should be handwritten.

Once the thank-you note is in the mail, review the interview. Some interviewers ask for salary expectations. For this, you can give a figure close to what your last job paid and then say you'd be willing to negotiate. It might be in your favor, however, to give a range of about $5,000 in which your last salary would fit.

Before you go to your next interview, call Statistics Canada to get an average salary for the job you're interested in. That will give you an idea of what salary you can expect. If you are really averse to talking about salary, you can say you are willing to negotiate and can be flexible.

About family, saying less is more. Say you are a hard worker and you don't let family or friends interfere with your work. Unless it is to your advantage, and usually it isn't, keep discussions of a non-professional nature to a minimum.

When asked about your availability, you should be honest. Starting the day after the interview is usually not practical and may backfire on you. Starting at the beginning of a week is good. If you are leaving your old job, you may need to give two weeks or more notice.

Unfortunately, each interview is different. Signs to look for include, how long did the interviewer keep you in his or her office and how much was the interviewer willing to tell you about the company's work style and the personal style of those you may be working with.

Job Search is a monthly column by job search consultant Lisa Galet. Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Lisa to The CJN.

HERB CAPLAN SELLS JENN-AIR FOR LESS

CRUNCHY VEGETABLE SALAD

1 lg. bunch Ontario Broccoli	1/2 cup each of vegetable oil and olive oil	1 1/2 tsp. basil
1 lg. Ontario Cauliflower		1/2 tsp. oregano
1 lb. Ontario Green Beans	1/3 cup white vinegar	1 tsp. granulated sugar
6 lg. Ontario Carrots, peeled	4 garlic cloves, crushed	1/4 tsp. each of salt and pepper
2 Ontario Zucchini	2 tsp. Dijon mustard

To prepare vegetables, bring large pot of water to a full boil. Trim stems of broccoli, thinly slice. Break remainder into small flowerets. Cut cauliflower into small flowerets. Trim beans and slice into bite-size pieces. Thinly slice carrots. Cut unpeeled zucchini in half, lengthwise, then slice.

Place broccoli pieces and carrots in a large metal steaming basket, then immerse in boiling water for 3 min. Remove and immediately rinse with cold water to stop cooking process, then turn into large bowl. Repeat this process with cauliflower and beans, boiling each for no more than 1 1/2 min.

Whisk together remaining ingredients and pour over vegetables. Stir until well mixed. Refrigerate for at least 2 hrs. Pour off dressing before serving. Keep refrigerated. Serves 12.

TORONTO — Ruth Friedman says dating is like drowning – and she wants to be your life-jacket.

For 16 years, Friedman played matchmaker for her friends and acquaintances. Then in August 1992, she turned her hobby into her professional business, Bringing People Together (BPT).

"My husband was the one who gave me the push," said Friedman, 40, in an interview. Then she added with a laugh, "I said to him, 'You really want me to meet single men everyday?' "

But Joe Friedman felt people could benefit from his wife's service. "She's doing this because she likes to," he said. "It's not just for the money. She likes to help people."

Not only does Friedman receive personal satisfaction by successfully matching her customers, but she has a vested interest in the growth of the Jewish community.

"My business is an attempt to continue and encourage Jewish continuity," she said. "I'm very concerned about the rate of intermarriage."

Her clientele of over 600 is exclusively Jewish from different streams of religious observance. She caters to all ages.

A randomly selected opinion pole, the Guide to Dating Services, rated BPT as the number 1 introductory service, Jewish or non-Jewish in Ontario. Of her clients polled, 100 percent would recommend her service to a friend, said their membership lived up to their initial expectations and rated the quality of service as very good.

"What makes Ruth's service so special is that it's so personal," said Joe. "She really gets to know her clients. Each one is screened and selected. She will refuse anyone she feels is untrustworthy."

Friedman doesn't just act as a matchmaker, but also as a "date therapist." She has guidelines for her clients to follow for the first date, to help relieve the stress of the initial encounter. As well, she seeks regular feedback from her clients.

Carol (not her real name) met her boyfriend of a year and a half through BPT. "I liked the personal aspects of the service and the frequent calling," she said.

She also noted that BPT was better than a computer dating service. "With a computer," Carol explained, "you only get the information that's on the screen. BPT is different because she [Friedman] knows her clients personally."

BPT has planned a number of informal get-togethers. Members offer their homes for barbeques or dessert parties, and BPT has hosted an evening at Comedywood at Bathurst and Steeles.

The gatherings allow people to meet in a relaxed setting. There is no loud music and guests are encouraged to mingle. Only members are invited, but each is permitted to bring a friend.

Shane (not his real name) just bought a house with his girlfriend, whom he met three years through BPT. He says he agrees with the laid- back approach.

"I went to a couple of other singles' parties, but I'm a shy person. I just didn't feel like I fit in. With the service, it was just me and her on a date and there was no problem communicating."

Even though BPT receives almost four new clients a day, Friedman is hesitant to expand too much. "If I went too big, I would lose control," she said.

ONTARIO DRUG BENEFITS

IMPORTANT News for Seniors and People Receiving Social Assistance

Because the federal government has reduced transfer payments for Ontario's health and social services by $2.1 billion over the next two years, the Ontario government must act now to preserve its drug programs.

Starting July 15, Ontario Drug Benefit recipients will contribute a small amount toward their prescription costs. Ontario is the last province to introduce co-payments.

How much you pay depends on your income. You will pay up to $2 per prescription if you are:

- single, 65 or over, with a net income of less than $16,018 per year
- a couple, both over 65, with a combined net income of less than $24,175 per year
- living in a nursing home, home for the aged or home for special care
- receiving welfare or family benefits
- receiving home care

You're 65 and your income is higher than the above? Then you pay the first $100 of your drug costs each year. After that, you'll pay only the ODB dispensing fee of up to $6.11 per prescription.

You have extra health insurance from a private company? Call your company. It may cover co-payment costs.

Call the Ministry of Health at 1-888-405-0405 if you have more questions. Or look for information sheets at your pharmacy.

The Last Word . . . Balance To Improve Investment Returns

Improving investment returns seems to be a primary objective in today's low interest rate market. The following are two suggestions which should improve your investment return.

– If investing in G.I.C. type of guaranteed investments, choose several investment periods for example 1 year, 2 year, 3 year.
– Add some mutual fund investment to your portfolio. If the fund performs well, it should improve the overall return of your guaranteed investments.

To learn more about achieving better results call 787-4517.

Nemsila case to proceed

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Federal Court judge has rejected a request for a stay of proceedings in the Joseph Nemsila war crimes case.

As a result, the case will continue to wind its way through the legal system – unless Nemsila's lawyers appeal the decision.

Federal Court Justice Paul Rouleau said he would not grant a stay because there was no evidence "this matter was ever referred to or discussed at the meeting between the assistant deputy attorney general and the chief justice (of the Federal Court) or that any specific requests or complaints were made by the department as to the manner in which the matter had been handled or its disposition."

The March 1 meeting between Assistant Deputy Attorney General Ted Thompson and Chief Justice Julius Isaac – at which three other Nazi war crimes cases were discussed – prompted the stay application by Nemsila's lawyers. (See earlier story on page 16.)

But Rouleau said the situation in the Nemsila case was different than the other cases, which were still proceeding before the Federal Court.

In the absence of an appeal of Rouleau's decision, the next order of business in the Nemsila case is Jerome's decision on the question of domicile. An Immigration adjudicator had ruled that because Nemsila had acquired Canadian domicile by residing in Canada for five years, he could not be deported. Federal authorities appealed that decision to the Federal Court and Jerome's decision on the issue was being awaited when Nemsila's lawyers filed the stay application.

Jerome's ruling is expected shortly. Should he rule that Nemsila's domicile does not grant him immunity from deportation, the case would return to the Immigration adjudicator to be heard on its merits.

BBYO Canada closes

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A restructuring of B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO) has spelled the end of BBYO Canada and led to shakeups at the regional levels, but officials insist the moves will not change programs and services for Jewish teens in Canada.

A budget cut of roughly $129,000 from the Washington headquarters of B'nai B'rith International (BBI) means that BBYO Canada, set up three years ago, will be shut down. Liz Sokolsky, the full-time national director, has been dismissed.

In what officials say are unrelated, separate developments, regional shake-ups have led to the recent dismissal of BBYO

Canada/Israel free trade to be signed this week

By LEORA EREN-FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — Canada and Israel were expected to sign a long-awaited free trade agreement this week during the visit of Israeli Industry and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky.

The signing will cap 20 months of negotiations on an accord that will remove all tariffs from industrial products as of Jan. 1, 1997. The agreement – which excludes certain agricultural and fishery products – must still be ratified by both parliaments.

It is expected to boost bilateral trade to a billion dollars a year – about three times the current volume.

The agreement was to have been signed in July, but was held up because of Israeli demands to allow textiles sewn in Jordan to be covered by the pact. Canada rejected that demand, and the two sides agreed to defer the issue for two years, said Zohar Peri, head of the international trade division of the Israeli Ministry of Industry and Trade.

The agreement will be signed in Toronto by Trade Minister Art Eggleton and his Israeli counterpart, Natan Sharansky.

"There is no one better suited to sign the agreement than Art Eggleton, who has been an enthusiastic supporter of free trade with Israel from the start," said Peri, "long before other Canadian officials embraced the idea."

Sharansky, a former Prisoner of Zion, who now heads the seven-member Knesset faction Yisrael b'Aliyah, will be on his first visit to Canada since becoming a minister in the Netanyahu government.

BUSES STONED IN RELIGIOUS RIOT

Jerusalem had its fourth successive day of violence when members of the ultra-Orthodox Neturei Karta sect, jeered by anti-religious opponents, paraded from Mea Shearim to the outskirts of the city.

They shouted "shabbes, shabbes" at passing car drivers and exchanged stones with counter-demonstrators. The real violence, however, came after dark when Egged buses, inaugurating the post-Sabbath service through Mea Shearim, were again stoned.

RABBI ROSENBERG DELAYS DECISION

A report that Jewish day school supporters will cooperate with Catholic and other separate school spokesmen in voting against the Davis government unless their request for aid is complied with was not confirmed by Rabbi Stuart Rosenberg, chairman of the Ontario Committee for Government Aid to Jewish Day Schools.

The CJN was informed that "we will wait for future developments to make our decision on political action.

"Our committee has been promised that this matter will be dealt with in package form, so that Catholic, Jewish and Protestant groups will be treated with the same degree of fairness and equity."

Government launches new war crimes case

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Wasily (Wasil) Bogutin was a member of a collaborationist police detachment in Nazi-occupied Ukraine who participated in the execution of a Jewish family, including a small child, documents filed last week in Federal Court allege.

Also killed by members of the Selidovka District Police in the same 1941 incident was a former militiaman named Pridatko. Pridatko, along with the Jewish man, named Abram, his wife and child were all killed "at the trenches behind the former military registration office in the old centre of Selidovka," the document alleges.

Federal officials are attempting to deport Bogutin, 87, because of his alleged wartime collaboration with German forces and because he lied about those activities when he immigrated to Canada in 1951 and when he applied for citizenship in 1958.

Documentation filed last week describe Bogutin — who was known during the war as Vasily Abramovich Bakutin — as a member of the Selidovka District (Raion) Police from 1941-43. The unit was known by the Germans as the Hilfspolizei (auxiliary police) and after October 1942 as the Schutzmannschaft.

Bogutin allegedly served as an investigator with the unit, "conducted interrogations of prisoners, which included beatings, and escorted prisoners to the German prison in nearby Krasnoarmeisk. In the spring of 1943, [Bogutin] ordered the arrests of young girls for the purposes of deportation to Germany for forced labor."

The document alleges that Bogutin admitted that in December 1941 he "was at the site of the execution by the Selidovka District Police and Germans of approximately 10 persons, including a woman and child, at the mine shaft on the outskirts of Selidovka. [Bogutin] has admitted that, on orders of the chief of police, he took away the victims' clothing when the shooting was over."

His police unit "participated in the arrests and executions of civilians, including Jews [and Soviet POWs]. The Selidovka District Police participated in the identification, arrest and interrogation of suspected partisans and communist functionaries, the forcible confinement of civilians as hostages, the confiscation of property for the use of German authorities, as well as the rounding-up of youths for the purposes of deportation for forced labor to Germany," the document states.

Bogutin has denied the allegations. He told reporters in Toronto he never served as a policeman but that he worked in a warehouse run by the local police.

He also claimed his father was Jewish but changed the family named to Bogutin from Bogutinsky to avoid persecution by the communists.

Jewish groups welcomed the start of denaturalization proceedings against Bogutin. "This is the description of a man with blood on his hands," said Goldie Hershon, president of Canadian Jewish Congress. "It sounds like the classic case of a Nazi war criminal becoming a citizen of our country by concealing his murderous past."

Lyle Smordin, president of B'nai Brith Canada, said "as war crimes continue throughout the world, it is imperative that Canada demonstrates that it will not be a haven for mass murderers."

Bogutin is the latest alleged Nazi war criminal to face deportation since federal ministers announced in January 1995 that 12 cases would be brought forward. Justice Department officials have said a seventh case will be announced in the near future.

For more on war crimes proceedings in Canada, see pages 16, 17.

ISRAELI SCOUTS ENTERTAIN

The Israel Scout Friendship Caravan was recently in Ontario performing before large appreciative audiences in Mel Lastman Square and at the Centre Camp of the Bathurst Jewish Centre in North York, as well as in Niagara Falls. The Scouts, five girls and five boys, performed songs from past and present. Here Galil, 17, entertains one of her fans.

HAVE YOUR HAIR PERMED, COLOURED AND HIGHLIGHTED, ALL IN BEAUTIFUL GLORIOUS CONDITION!
We have talked with Mr. Shelley, President of N.A.H.D., world-renowned and Owner of Shelley's Hairstyling. Shelley spent years of research and discovered the use of Amino Acids which "help restore chemically broken bonds in damaged hair."
He also discovered the use of Low [illegible] ingredient. Just picture numbers from 1-12. Your natural hair level is about P.H.5; regular perms and hair colouring are a much higher P.H. and the higher you go, the more damage will occur. I concentrate on bringing down the P.H. levels of my perms and colours to lower than P.H. 5, which makes them a treatment for the hair. This is a true revolution."

A loving salute

After the chupah, there is usually one transcendent moment during a wedding celebration, when the singing and the dancing fuse into a timeless expression of happiness and joy.

The parents of the newlywed couple are singled out for special attention. Sitting on chairs in full view of the entire assembly, often carried high above the shoulders of their cheering guests, they harvest an enduring memory, a loving salute by their friends, an intense recognition of labors that are shared. Among the invited, those who are themselves parents understand that parenting is devotion, sacrifice, hope, prayer and a good measure of luck.

And so, in one brief instant of deep gratitude, the parents who sit in the chairs and their friends who pay them such special homage, together thank God for having brought them all to this day in their lives.

On June 23 in Israel, Salim and Sara Suede, parents celebrating the marriage of their daughter Yvette, were honored by their friends in this special manner, for great indeed was their gratitude. In the mid-1980s Salim and his brother Eli were abducted by Syrian police, for months ruthlessly tortured, and then locked away. They had disappeared without a trace. For 18 months, their families received no word from them or about them. Their father died of the heartbreak. They were to spend 5½ years in a Syrian jail.

At this wedding however, the celebration reached even higher. After Salim and Sara were carried high upon happy shoulders, their friends then offered their shoulders to one of the guests. In poignant acknowledgment of a debt that can never be repaid, in open song and in thanks, they lifted Judy Feld Carr in her own chair of honor. More than anyone else on this earth, she had helped to bring them all to this day in their lives.

Today, fewer than 150 Jews remain in Syria. Last year, the covert effort which resulted in the rescue of the entire Jewish community of Syria came officially to a close. For more than 23 years, from her home in midtown Toronto, Feld Carr had been the driving force behind that effort.

The outline of the story of the rescue of Syrian Jewry has already been told in this newspaper and in the general media. Many of the details within that outline, of necessity, are still untold. Some details, however, are now coming to light.

Earlier this summer, a week and a half before Yvette Suede was married, Haifa University bestowed on Feld Carr the Humanitarian Award of Merit. It is a highly esteemed distinction, seldom conferred. The last person to receive the award was Menachem Begin almost two decades ago. The bestowal of the award to Feld Carr had originally been scheduled for November 1995, but the murder of Yitzhak Rabin forced its postponement.

The ceremony atop Mount Carmel was a rare occasion. As it was described to me by people who were there, it was a unique coming together for the first time of the rescued, the rescuer and representatives of those governments whose officials clandestinely assisted the rescuer in her tireless campaign. Canada's ambassador to Amman, on behalf of the Canadian Ministry of Foreign Affairs, attended, as did members of Israel's Foreign Ministry and other governmental officials who were involved in the operation.

Not surprisingly, as a story echoing the noblest calls throughout Jewish history, the occasion received wide press coverage in Israel. Judith Sudilovsky devoted an entire page to the story in the Jerusalem Post under a headline borrowing a theme out of a Le Carre novel: "The 'bubbie' who came in from the cold. Only now can the story be told of a Canadian woman's monumental efforts to rescue Syrian Jews."

One of the details which Sudilovsky provided related to Feld Carr's interventions after the disappearance of Salim and Eli Suede: "Feld Carr contacted the UN Committee on Disappearance and finally the Syrians admitted to holding the Suede brothers. Their family did not recognize them when they were at last permitted to see the brothers. Through her (Feld Carr's) underground channels, she provided money to Salim's wife and six children and maintained a constant correspondence with them."

Here is another of the details Sudilovsky painted. "Although not one of the Jews she rescued was ever caught, there were many heartbreaking moments, such as the time when a father who had been told he could take all four of his young children was forced to choose only two when he was already in the airport. Later, she (Feld Carr) was able to get the other two released as well."

Yediot Achronot, Israel's most widely circulated daily, dedicated two pages to the story under the headline: "The rescue channel of Mrs. Judy" (my translation).

Yehuda Koren added some further details to the outline: "Syrian Jewry knew her only by her first name, 'Mrs. Judy,' but there was enough in that name to persuade mothers to separate from their children and hand them over to one of Mrs. Judy's emissaries ..."

"I [Feld Carr speaking to Koren] felt no greater happiness than when I would telephone someone in New York or in Bat Yam who had left Syria in the 1950s and tell him that his sister or his mother had landed safely in the west. They would literally shout for joy and then ask me: 'But how do you know? Who are you?' I would answer only: I am Judy."

Had he not been assassinated, Rabin would have personally read the following letter to Judy Feld Carr in November. Alas, it was read posthumously on his behalf. "Words cannot express my gratitude to you for 23 years of hard and dangerous work, during which you devoted your time and life to the Jewish community in Syria ...Very few people, if any, have contributed as greatly as you have. The Jews of Syria who were rescued and the State of Israel owe you so much ... Judy, the State of Israel salutes you."

North York home vandalized with anti-Semitic slogans

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The interior of a North York home — including a 4-year-old's bedroom — was vandalized last week with anti-Semitic slogans including "Die Jew Die," "Gas Chamber" and "Holocaust Again."

Canadian Jewish Congress has offered a $5,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of those responsible for the incident.

No valuables were taken during the break-in despite the fact a camera and china were in plain view.

It is believed the vandal or vandals broke into the home through a screen window while the homeowners and their son were away during the day. The vandal(s) used the child's crayon, a pencil and the owners' own blue paint and a pastry brush to daub the inner walls and doors of the home with a swastika and anti-Semitic grafitti.

"I was devastated," said the mother, who asked not to be identified. "They're more than robbers, they're sick."

Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Congress, said a similar incident involving anti-Semitic grafitti in the interior of a Jewish home took place three or four years ago in York Region. Otherwise, that sort of vandalism is rare, he said.

CJC offering $5,000 reward

Police from 33 Division were called to the scene as well as forensic experts who took fingerprint samples from a window. The Metro Toronto Police hate crime unit was informed of the incident.

Det. Bob Peddle, who's heading the investigation, said the case will be given "high priority. It'll go to the top of the list among break and enters."

The detective admitted there were few leads during the initial stage of the investigation, adding the perpetrator used gloves to mask his fingerprints.

After notifying police, who photographed the slogans, the parents scrubbed the slogans from the wall. A day later, all that remained of the grafitti were two hate messages in the child's room. There, above wallpaper decorated with clowns, elephants and other circus scenes, were two pencilled-in messages: "Die Jew Die" and "Dirty Jew."

Moshe Ronen, chair of Congress' Ontario region, said "when such an outrageous anti-Semitic crime like this occurs in a family home, it affects us all as an entire community. It is for this reason we are offering this reward in the hope it assists the police in bringing these racist hooligans to justice."

Nightclub denied liquor licence

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As a result of objections from nearby residents, the giant Luxor night club on Dufferin Street, built to hold 3,000 patrons, has been denied a liquor licence.

The Luxor owner, Marc Hazout, was not able to rebut the claims of residents that liquor would aggravate the problems of traffic and noise, the Liquor Licence Board said in a ruling signed by Andromache Karakatsanis, chair, and members Harish Jain and Lillian Ma.

"All I can say is the decision is wrong," said Hazout. "We disagree strenuously and we've instructed counsel to appeal the decision."

The night club is on the former premises of the Idomo furniture warehouse at the corner of Steep Rock Boulevard and Dufferin Street, opposite an apartment complex and the houses of Bathurst Manor. About 600 objections to the granting of a licence were filed.

The decision was hailed by Councillor Mike Feldman who, along with Metro Councillor Howard Moscoe, led the opposition to the licence.

"I feel bad for the owner, but we invited him early in the game to come directly to the community with his plans and he didn't," said Feldman. "The decision is a vindication of the sound presentations by objectors."

The board's ruling said they were not satisfied that Luxor had answered the legitimate concerns of residents. The owner has had limited experience in running a licensed establishment, the board said, noting that with a possible 3,000 customers it would be 50 per cent larger than any other of its type in Metro Toronto.

"The security plans do not sufficiently ensure that problems will be curtailed outside the establishment," the board said.

Denial of the liquor licence is the latest round in a saga which has extended through 1995 and 1996. In February, a district court judge disallowed a North York bylaw put forward by Feldman, which denied Luxor a building permit.

The board said Luxor was a "mega club" which depended on patrons flowing from one area to another and so there was no point in granting a liquor licence to one section and not another. In fact, the board added, the Luxor owners did not ask for separate licences and did not indicate they would be willing to reduce the number of patrons or hours of sale.

Holidays force Cancer Society to postpone fundraiser

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A major fundraiser for the Canadian Cancer Society has been postponed because it conflicted with Rosh Hashanah, Sept. 14 and 15.

The event was intended to coincide with the opening of Highway 407 across the top of Toronto. It was postponed by Al Palladini, Ontario minister of transportation, because of protests that the dates pre-empted Jewish participation.

The society apologized to Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region, but said the date had been chosen by the Canadian Highways International Corporation (CHIC) and the Ontario Transportation Capital Corporation (OTCC), and that other charities would take the event if the Cancer Society turned it down.

The event, called Hoops, Wheels and Deals, is to take place on a section of Highway 407, and includes a three-on-three basketball tournament with 450 teams, a 10- to 20-kilometre Great Ride to Beat Cancer cycling event, a classic and antique car show and an open air market with entertainment.

"In the end, cancer research [would have been] the real loser," said CJC national director of Community Relations Bernie Farber in a letter to the Cancer Society. He pointed out that many Jewish volunteers, doctors and cancer researchers work with the society.

"Cancer and its eradication is as important to the Jewish community as it is to anyone else," he wrote.

The event's rescheduling to a date a few weeks hence reflects the Ontario government's sensitivity to Jewish concerns, Farber said.

Conflicts with Rosh Hashanah

After Farber reported the conflict in dates, members of the Ontario region executive of Congress urged that the Cancer Society be advised how seriously it views the situation. All calendars clearly state dates of the Jewish new year holy day, Farber said. "This is not a case of the conflict not being known."

Marilyn Richmond told The CJN that her son, Elken, wanted to play in the basketball tournament and was shocked to find that it was on Rosh Hashanah. It was a mistake for the Cancer Society, or any other charity, to take such a date for a fundraiser, she said. Other initiatives could raise the needed money, she maintained.

The Vaughan Unit of the Cancer Society hopes to raise $500,000 to fund cancer research, patient services and health promotion from the Highway 407 event, according to coordinator Joan Rumack.

In a letter to Congress, Rumack said, "It was best to proceed, as cancer has no bounds as to race, color, creed or religious persuasion."

In reply, Farber wrote, "It is for this very reason that we are so disappointed."

"We appreciate the support that we have had over the years from members of the Jewish community," Rumack wrote.

Carl Goldenberg was a leading labor mediator

TORONTO — Carl Goldenberg, one of Canada's top labor mediators, died July 22 at the age of 88.

The former Liberal senator and Montreal native had been living and working in Toronto since his retirement from the Senate in 1982.

An outstanding labor lawyer, he was the son of a horse-and-cart peddler who understood the problems of the working poor.

Goldenberg is survived by Shirley, his wife of 51 years; son Eddie, one of Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's most trusted confidants; and two grandchildren.

Goldenberg settled the Montreal transit strike in 1943 and a year-long strike at the Royal York Hotel in 1962.

He was special counsel on the Constitution to former prime minister Pierre Trudeau from 1968 to 1971 before being appointed to the Senate in 1971.

He had a long and distinguished career of public service, beginning in 1936 when he was an adviser to the Royal Commission on Dominion-Provincial relations.

International forge

Life's ironies are often as cruel as they are unpredictable. The International Olympic Committee (IOC) obstinately refused to commemorate the Munich massacre at the games being played in Atlanta. It was inappropriate, they claimed, to intrude "politics" into the sportsmanship of the Olympic competitions. In this hypocritical, self-centred posture, the IOC has continually failed to grasp one of decency's central points: to stand against terror is not "politics." Rather, to stand against terror is to affirm the sanctity and the importance of human life, an affirmation which, one would assume, is the international forge linking the five olympic rings.

But in spite of the IOC's best efforts to retain its amoral neutrality on all matters "political," politics in the form of terror did unfortunately intrude into the competitions.

The pipebomb which blasted out the life of one person last Saturday morning and which injured 110 others was an outrage, as are all such craven and cowardly acts. It was not an act of politics; nor is any terrorism an act of politics. It was an act of murder, aptly called by President Bill Clinton what it truly is: "evil."

The Atlanta bomb exploded while all decent people were still suffering the aftershock of TWA flight 800, reeling from concussive waves of anger and dread. As of this writing, the pieces of evidence which will establish the cause, if not immediately the perpetrators, of the disaster are still being gathered. With each piece of wreckage lifted from the cold ocean, it seems increasingly certain that the plane was brought down, and with it the lives of so many, also by an "evil" act of terror.

Though trite, it must be reiterated: Whether "homegrown," as seems likely with the Atlanta bomb, or "foreign," as seems likely with TWA 800, terror must be stopped and terrorists must be brought to justice. This requires, as we have written on numerous occasions before, a concerted, cooperative campaign among all countries whose highest striving is the affirmation of the sanctity and the importance of human life.

Countries which endorse, encourage, support, maintain or aid terrorists must be cast out from the arena of international fellowship. We urge the government of Canada to initiate the campaign.

A truth that stares

Yasser Arafat was, arguably, a partial midwife at the birth of a new government in Israel last May.

He simply failed to persuade a majority of Israelis that he was either sincere or capable of curbing Palestinian violence and terror against Israeli citizens. As a result, he must now deal with a government which has vowed to be less trusting and more testing of both his sincerity and his capability. But judging by recent events, he still seems not to have understood this obvious and fundamental truth about security for Israelis and autonomy for Palestinians. Last week, Arafat again praised the murderers of Israelis. He was reported to have told a mass rally in Gaza: "We are committed to all martyrs who died for the cause of Jerusalem starting with Ahmed Musa until the last martyr, Yehiya Ayash." Ayash was the mastermind of the suicide bombings.

By praising the murderers, he encourages others to follow in their ways. And by encouraging such evil ways, he cannot possibly persuade Israelis of his sincerity, let alone of his capability. The truth stares at him from the rostrum of the Knesset, but he does not see, or cannot see, or won't see. Without the confidence of Israelis, he cannot improve the lives of Palestinians.

"WISDOM OF THE AGES"

Setting the record straight

In our July 11 issue we published a letter from Issie Veisfeld of Montreal, President of the Association of Survivors of Nazi Oppression, who attacked Ernst Zundel for his views on the Holocaust and urged that he be denied Canadian citizenship.

Mr. Zundel replied to the editor as follows:

"I do not spread vicious lies about Holocaust survivors like himself. I do not know Mr. Veisfeld. He is not listed in the Montreal phone book, neither is his alleged Association of Survivors of Nazi Oppression.

"I have not lied to the Canadian government in order to immigrate to Canada.

"I am not a hate-monger. The publishing or spreading of hate literature in Canada is an indictable, criminal offence like bank robbery or child-molesting. I have never been charged or convicted under Canadian law of hatemongering. You could not call a man a bank robber and child molester in print if in fact they were not convicted of this offence. Therefore, you and the media will have to get used to it that I will no longer be libelled by the term Hatemonger attached to my name."

We retract any suggestion that Mr. Zundel lied in order to immigrate to Canada.

Mr. Zundel has never been charged or convicted of any hate propaganda crime in Canada. He was, however, convicted in 1985 and then again in 1988 of spreading false news when he distributed a pamphlet entitled Did Six Million Really Die? Truth at Last Exposed. The first conviction was set aside because of the conduct of the trial and the second was quashed because the criminal offence was ruled unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of Canada in 1992.

He has recently appealed to the Federal Court of Canada to quash a decision by the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC) that he is not eligible for citizenship because he was found by that body to be a threat to the security of Canada. The SIRC decision is the first step in a process that could lead to his deportation.

The Jews of Bulawayo

I refer to the article by Viva Press (CJN, June 13) about her visit to Zimbabwe, and particularly to Bulawayo, where I have lived for almost 60 years.

I would like to point out that there were never 10,000 Jews living in Bulawayo. The number of Jews in the whole of Southern Rhodesia (now Zimbabwe) has never exceeded 8,000, of which approximately 3,500 lived in Bulawayo. At present, there are approximately 330 Jewish souls, including children, remaining in Bulawayo.

As a matter of interest, the "97-year-old gentleman who davened Minchah" is Leizer Abrahamson, my wife's uncle. Whenever the rabbi is away, he conducts the Saturday services including the reading of the Torah, and on festivals he assists the rabbi. On Yom Kippur, he leads the Shacharit and Minchah services, and then remains on his feet during the entire Neilah service.

In Bulawayo, we still have a service every morning as well as every evening of the week.

We also have a home for the Jewish aged, Savyon Lodge, which is supported by the Jewish communities of Bulawayo and Harare.

Queries translation of title of Herzl book

Theodor Herzl's major work Der Judenstaat cannot be translated into English as "The Jewish State" (CJN July 11), as is usually and quite erroneously done. Had Herzl wanted it to be "The Jewish State," he would have selected "Der jüdische Staat" for the title of his book. Der Judenstaat, when properly translated into English, reads: The Jews' State.

Herzl (who chose German as the official language of his future Jews' state) wanted the establishment of a secularly national Jewish republic.

Hence translating Der Judenstaat into "The Jewish State" reflects characterisation which was alien to Herzl.

Calling all Tetievers

Kehillat Yaakov-Warrensville Centre Synagogue will host a special Tetiever Nostalgia Shabbat on the weekend of Aug. 23 to 25. The weekend is dedicated to reminiscences about the Tetiever congregation in its various locations, as well as the history of the community of Tetiev, which is located in Ukraine, near Kiev, and once had a sizable Jewish community.

Rabbi Marvin Pritzker of Toronto, a former Clevelander who grew up in the Tetiever congregation, will serve as the scholar-in-residence.

The synagogue is also looking for memorabilia and pictures that it can use for a photo history. Inquiries should be sent to the synagogue office, 1508 Warrensville Ctr. Rd., Cleveland Heights, Ohio 44121 — phone 216-382-6566; fax 216-382-4237.

Tisha b'Av in the Sephardi tradition

By CANTOR AVIV OUANOUNOU

A 1748 engraving of Tisha b'Av services in the synagogue of Amsterdam. [Photo from The Story of Jerusalem, Am Oved, 1967]

There is probably no other holiday season in the Jewish calendar which is as sad for the Jewish nation as the three weeks bracketed by the 17th of Tammuz and Tisha b'Av. This period, known as ben-hamezarim (between the straits), is observed as a time of mourning over the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem. However, for the Sephardim this period has additional meaning, because in subsequent centuries Tisha b'Av became identified with still other tragic events in their life.

On this day in 1290, King Edward I signed the edict expelling his Jewish subjects from England. Also, it was on Tisha b'Av 1492, that the decree ordering the expulsion of all Jews from Spain was issued, the only alternative being either death or conversion to Christianity. Therefore, the ninth of Av has overshadowed all other fast days in Judaism and in Jewish tradition has become synonymous with mourning and tragedy. In this essay I shall attempt to relate some of the customs and traditions of the Sephardi people during this period of intensive mourning.

The mourning itself starts on the 17th of Tammuz, the day on which the daily sacrifice was suspended. This is also said to be the day on which the walls of Jerusalem fell prior to the destruction of the second Temple at the hands of the Romans. After the public fast of 17th of Tammuz, Sephardi Jews observe various aspects of mourning, some shared with Ashkenazi Jews, for a three week period. Men do not shave, people wear old clothes and no weddings take place. Mourning intensifies from the first to the ninth of Av when people stop eating meat (in some Moroccan communities even on Shabbat); they do not bathe, cut their hair, travel, nor undertake any new ventures.

The Shabbat before Tisha b'Av is known in the Sephardi heritage as Shabbat Hazon or Shabbat Eicha. The chazzan chants the Shabbat melodies in a special makam (musical mode) which is reserved for this Shabbat and which reflects the sadness of the ninth of Av and the destruction of the Temple. As mentioned above, several communities in Morocco did not eat meat even on Shabbat, thus showing their sadness in the week before Tisha b'Av.

The three Haftorot that precede Tisha b'Av, known as shelosha depuranuta, are all sung in a special sad melody, different from the normal tunes in which the Haftorot are usually chanted. However, in each of these three Haftarot, there are verses which speak of comfort, and these verses are chanted in the regular Haftorah melody.

The seudah hamafseket (the meal before the fast of Av) is eaten on the floor near the doorway of the house. Each member of the family sits on the ground apart from one another so as not to be in a "social atmosphere." The meal consists of a cooked dish of lentils and hard-boiled eggs which are dipped into ashes and salt in remembrance of the destruction of the Temple.

Upon arrival at the synagogue on the night of Tisha b'Av, the people sit on the floor just as mourners do, and before Arvit many kinot (lamentations), which are found in a special prayer book called Kol Techina, are recited. These kinot, which the Sephardim read both before and after Megillat Eicha, are a collection of liturgical dirges composed by Jewish poets of different ages. In these poems, the authors gave vent to their feelings for Jewish sufferings in every age, and thus recorded in them the sad events in our history. In countries such as Yemen and Morocco, their mourning was very intensive, and they would spend most of the night and the day in weeping and in the recitation of kinot.

There is a very special kinah, similar to the Four Questions of the Passover Haggadah, entitled Aleichem eida kedosha eshael mikem Shelot. In this kinah, the author compares, in poetic manner, the differences between the joy and elation of Pesach night and the sadness and mourning of Tisha b'Av. It opens with the words, "I ask you, holy congregation, why is this night different from all other nights;" but it concludes with an expression of comfort and hope. This connects Tisha b'Av and Pesach according to the tradition that shows Tisha b'Av falling on the same day of the week as that on which Pesach fell during the given year.

Another famous kinah, recited after Shacharit, is called Aich Navi Chatati hishmima. This story from the Talmud speaks abut the son and daughter of Rabbi Yishmael Cohen Gadol (the high priest) who were each captured after the war in Jerusalem, by two different masters. The two masters happened to be good friends, and as such, one master told his friend that he had captured a very handsome boy, while his friend claimed that he had captured a very beautiful girl. They said to one another, "let us mate these two servants and we shall divide the children between us."

The kinah continues to describe how the masters put the two "servants" together in a dark room, in order to carry out their plan. As the "servants" each sat in a corner, they cried in their hearts all night long: "How may I marry a servant, for I am the ancestor of Aaron Hacohen?" In the morning, as light appeared in the room, the "servants" recognized one another, and at once ran to and kissed each other. At that moment, they both prayed to G-d to remove their souls, so that their masters could not force them to commit the horrible crime.

A vast majority of kinot are termed as Shire Zion, or Zionades. All of these kinot begin with an address to Zion and express an ardent longing for the Holy Mountain. They overflow with words of love and reverence for the Holy Land and of yearning to see her and abide in her. The most famous of these songs of Zion, such as Zion Halo Tishali, were written by the great Hebrew poet and singer of Zion, the physician and philosopher, Rabbi Yehuda Halevi, who died in 1140. Among the other composers of the kinot are the equally well-known Sephardi poets Shlomo Ibn Gabirol, Judah Alharizi and Abraham Ibn Ezra.

After the kinot are recited, the book of Eicha is read with tears and sadness. During its recital there is almost complete darkness in the synagogue and the chazzan and congregants sit on the floor. This book, authored by the Prophet Jeremiah who witnessed the destruction of the first Temple, is full of lamentations. In five chapters, the prophet gives heartbreaking vent to his lament over the destroyed and desolate Jerusalem. Notice should be taken of the alphabetical order of the verses, which were probably so arranged in order to assist memorizing the book. Eicha is read to the strains of a very mournful tune and the Yeminites have different tunes for the different chapters. Among the Sephardim, it is customary to read not only the book of Eicha but also that of Job.

It is a Sephardi tradition that on the night of Tisha b'Av individuals sleep on a mattress on the floor, and it is a Moroccan custom to place a rock (or rocks) under the pillow in fulfilment of the following verse: "And this stone which I have set up for a pillar shall be God's house, and of all that Thou shalt give me I will surely give the tenth unto Thee" (Genesis:28, verse 22).

In some Sephardi communities, the torah mappah (vestment) was turned inside out, and so too, the parochet (ark curtain). Similarly, the teva is draped in black and the rimmonim (bells) are not used. Instead of using the regular silver pointer, a plain reed is used for pointing to the place in the sefer Torah, which is read in a sad manner but in the regular notes. Additionally, the gabbi used to place ashes on the heads of the people present in the synagogue when reciting the kinah of Asara Harugei Malchut (The 10 Martyrs).

In some European Sephardi communities, after the morning service and kinot, the children would conduct a mock funeral to express their sadness. Some children made a symbolic grave (machora preta, in Spanish), covered a stone with a black piece of cloth, and wept over it to express the gloominess of Tisha b'Av for the Jewish people.

The women of Turkey used to sit in groups and weep and wail over the destruction of the Temples as they read the kinot in Arabic or Spanish. Thus they expressed sadness evoking prayers such as the story about Hannah and her seven sons and the story about the murder of the Prophet Zechariya in the Court of Priests, and so on. They also go to the cemetery to weep for the departed.

It was also a custom observed by many of the Sephardi Jews not to work on Tisha b'Av (or on Purim) because it was felt that little would be gained from the day's toil. There is a popular adage which states: "Kaspei eicha vekaspei mi kamocha ein bahem siman beracha," which literally means that money earned during Purim or on Tisha b'Av does not carry blessing.

Tisha b'Av is the date of a host of sad memories and we must all feel a part of the pain and suffering that our people endured on this day. Our sages, who foresaw it, order us to mourn this great calamity by abstaining from all food and work. The following Talmudic statement is probably the best explanation for our continued observance of Tisha b'Av in all its severity even today: "Rejoice ye with Jerusalem, and be glad for joy with her, all ye that mourn for her." That is to say, all who mourn the loss of her pristine greatness and glory will witness the restoration of her ancient majesty. The value of the fast of Av lies not only in remembering the past and applying its lesson to the present, but also in recognizing the unity of our people, the continuity of its existence and the destiny which yet awaits fulfilment.

Although the State of Israel has been established, the Holy Temple is not yet rebuilt. So long as this is the case, world Jewry will continue to mourn its loss. The hope is strong in our hearts that the time may not be far removed when Tisha b'Av will become an important festival of joy instead of a day of mourning and a fast.

The renewal of an ideal

Part I

The call to aliyah today often creates feelings of estrangement and hostility among Diaspora Jewry.

At a recent gathering of leaders of world Jewry, the president of Israel called for aliyah as the obvious solution to the Diaspora's concern with Jewish continuity. After all, assimilation would cease and their continuity would be assured if Jews would only leave the fleshpots of the Diaspora and join the historic renaissance of the Jewish people in its homeland.

By David Hartman

The president's speech was understood as patronizing and humiliating, ignoring Diaspora Jewry's efforts at building its own viable social and cultural frameworks. They were turning to Israel for partnership, not salvation.

Is this encounter symptomatic of a deep cultural schism within the Jewish people? Must Israelis be silent about aliyah – the central dream of the Zionist revolution – in order to maintain meaningful dialogue with the Diaspora?

In the following series of articles, I shall argue that the concept of aliyah must undergo a radical transformation if it is not to become extinct and irrelevant. But, before continuing, I shall discuss a feature of Jewish law which informs my position. The Languages of Mirroring and Aspiration

Jewish law can be understood in terms of the distinction between mirroring and aspiration, that is, between norms which reflect reality and those which point to new possibilities.

One function of law is to provide stability and order by mediating existing standards and values. Law thus mirrors where people "are at." A law that ignores what the majority of people can appreciate and appropriate in everyday life is doomed to failure.

Another function of law is to awaken the community to strive to higher goals and ideals. From this perspective, law educates rather than mirrors. Its goal is to challenge and to inspire change. It may upset the status quo in order to lead people from where "they are" to where "they could be."

In the final analysis, morality and law must balance the conservative need for stability and the progressive pull to educate and change. A law which speaks the language of reality without awakening alternative possibilities becomes stagnant and suffocating; a law which speaks the language of aspiration without recognizing what people are really like becomes irrelevant and meaningless.

This distinction can shed light on the problematic meaning of the concept of aliyah in contemporary Jewish life.

In the past, aliyah was a response to political crises which threatened our very existence. Massive movements of Jews to Israel were directly related to persecution and anti-Semitism. Jews "escaped" to Israel. Aliyah was more a "running away from" than a "striving for something higher."

The Canadian or American experience, however, differs radically from this paradigm. In America, where I grew up, and in Canada, where I served as a rabbi and university professor, Jews are very, very comfortable. Even when experiencing a sense of marginality, Jews basically feel safe and at home. There is no crisis driving them to seek aliyah as an answer to their survival needs.

This is the crux of the dilemma: We can no longer talk an aliyah language that is nurtured by alienation and crisis. The overriding threat to North American Jewry is assimilation and not anti-Semitism or marginality. And, no matter how serious a threat assimilation is, it is not experienced as a life-threatening crisis.

Although caring Jews do consider assimilation a real crisis, those who assimilate view their behavior as free and uncoerced. They are not reacting to an external threat. Some might even recommend assimilation as a liberating alternative to the burdensome guilt of feeling responsible for Jewish history and culture.

Ironically, assimilation can be understood as a longing for normalcy – the very same notion which inspired so many Zionists. If our aliyah pitch is to live a "normal" life, we expose ourselves to the response that intermarriage and assimilation are perfectly good ways of achieving normalcy in America.

The promise of normalcy has little effect on people who experience their identities as normal. For them, the Zionist dream of normalcy has already been realized. The promise of aliyah has been fulfilled in America!

We must understand this new historical reality and, instead of hunting for signs of anti-Semitism and new Farakhans in order to reignite the cause of aliyah, we must face the fact that American Jewry is not a community in crisis.

"Jewish identity and the call to aliyah can no longer be delined by an external enemy. It must be nurtured by something very different: personal conviction and solidarity with Jewish historical destiny."

Peace belongs to whole nation

The motto of Benjamin Netanyahu's first "victory" speech, to his followers, was "peace begins at home." That of his second, to the U.S. Congress, was about peace with Israel's neighbors. Its motto might have been that such peace is no partisan affair but is for all Israel — for the whole nation.

By Emil Fackenheim

Speaking to the government of the world's "greatest democracy," the prime minister dwelled on peace between democracies that do not "initiate aggression" or "military adventurism" — a peace treaty that is not a mere piece of paper. But since Israel's neighbors are not democracies, ill-willed media have reported him as wanting no peace at all. Yet he emphasized the peace with Egypt and Jordan, the first negotiated by Likud, the second by Labor. "We want a peace that lasts," said the prime minister. No Israeli government can aim at less.

Why mention peace between democracies? First, to stress that the peace available requires security; for Israel to demand it is no mere political ploy. Second, democracies at peace with other democracies hector Israel to take risks which they would not take themselves, nay, cannot even conceive of; but this is exposed as unethical. Third, for Israel to be pressured into taking such risks — rather than to weigh them herself — is equally unethical.

Currently Israel is being asked to ease the closure of the territories which is causing great hardships among Palestinians. In promising that he would, Netanyahu has made it clear that he is not reacting to world pressure but is counting on Yasser Arafat to make the opening safe. The word "reciprocity" has been added to our political dictionary. I hope it stays.

Goldhagen's book

The number of comments I received on a recent column that dealt with Daniel Goldhagen's book, Hitler's Willing Executioners, was no surprise. The Holocaust remains the most potent experience of our people — and certainly will remain so far a while to come. What is different about the book is the author's attempt to prove that Germany's history of the last 100 plus years made the planned extermination of Jews almost inevitable. For German anti-Semitism, he says, was "eliminational" in nature, that is to say that its prime content was to get rid of Jews one way or the other. Hitler was therefore doing only what the vast majority of Germans had wanted all along.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Goldhagen's extreme thesis has drawn a lot of attention. Most historians, both Jewish and non-Jewish, have pointed to the book's lacunae and errors and have generally been unfavorable to his thesis. The most thorough analysis I have seen is by Robert S. Wistrich, professor of Modern European and Jewish History at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. His article appeared in the current (July) issue of Commentary and is worth reading.

Wistrich acknowledges that the author excels in a number of areas. For instance, he shows how enthusiastic the German police battalions were in executing their grisly task — even though they could have requested a different kind of service. But very few did and most participated with vigor in the so-called "Jew-hunts." The same was true for the way they maimed, tortured and humiliated Jews in the concentration camps.

But, says Wistrich, none of this proves "that the killers killed because they were Germans, or that their actions were representative of the vast majority when they helped in destroying the Jews ... Although anti-Semitism was certainly decisive for the Nazi leadership, Goldhagen has simply not presented a persuasive case that it was what primarily or exclusively motivated ordinary Germans."

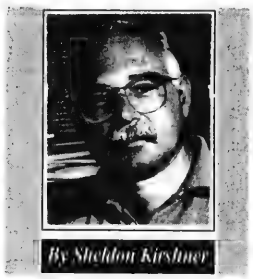
Wistrich then proceeds to what I consider is his basic observation: "In a curious and probably unintended way, Goldhagen's book blurs what was distinctive about the Holocaust. By diverting our attention from the millions done to death by desk-murderers, S.S. units, and Wehrmacht soldiers, and focusing instead on the relatively small numbers killed by police battalions or guards on death marches, Goldhagen brings to the fore precisely those features — brutality, sadism, killing for sport — that are not primarily unique to the Holocaust but rather part of the endless catalogue of human cruelty through the ages. The fact that the Holocaust represented industrialized killing on a mass scale, ordered by a powerful state in the grip of a mad hatred, somehow gets lost; and yet it is, after all, the key fact."

I am often asked whether I think that "it can happen again." Of course it can, but it would require some very special circumstances. While it is possible, it is unlikely, especially since there is now an independent and strong Israel to secure the Jewish future.

The Kirshner File

Politics is Hugh Segal's undying passion

There are not many people in this world who are so precocious, so accomplished and so supremely self-confident



By Sheldon Kirshner

Hugh Segal, political apparatchik, newspaper columnist, TV panelist and business consultant, happily joined that rare breed recently with the publication of his book, No Surrender (HarperCollins, $28).

Anecdotal and analytical, No Surrender is an autobiography which begins and ends with politics, an undying passion which resonates in every fibre of his being. Segal, in case you haven't heard, is a Progressive Conservative, a Red Tory who has toiled as a policy advisor for the likes of William Davis, the former premier of Ontario; Robert Stanfield, the leader of the federal Conservatives in the 1960s and 1970s; and Brian Mulroney, the last Conservative prime minister.

And, as Segal suggests in No Surrender, he briefly toyed with the idea of running for the leadership of the Conservative party against Kim Campbell after Mulroney announced his intention to step down.

Today, three years on, Segal — who has moved seamlessly between politics and the private sector — is back on Bay Street. Commuting from his home in Kingston, Ont., Segal is an investment counsellor in the Toronto firm of Gluskin Sheff.

Yet, though he has no plans to return to the hurly-burly of public life, politics is still in his blood. At Queen's University School of Policy Studies, he teaches a graduate course in political science. For the Toronto Star, he writes a guest column. And on the CBC and CTV television networks, he pontificates on current events.

Segal's association with the Conservatives goes back a long way, to a classroom in Montreal when he was a 12-year-old student at the United Talmud Torah. John Diefenbaker, the then Tory prime minister, visited the school and delivered an impromptu speech which, as Segal writes, "grabbed me by the throat."

Impressed by Diefenbaker's vision of an open, tolerant and humane society where the strictures of class and bigotry were irrelevant, Segal gravitated toward the Conservatives, campaigning for candidate Stanley Shenkman in the 1962 federal election and twice running for parliament in the 1970s. By doing so, he broke ranks with his Russian-born grandfather, an NDPer, union organizer and ladies' tailor, and his father, an ardent Liberal who earned his living as a taxi driver.

Given Segal's working-class background, I could not resist asking why he hadn't joined the Liberals or the NDP and instead had been smitten by the Conservatives, which, historically speaking, has attracted few Jews.

I posed this question as we sat in a conference room near his office in a sumptuous skyscraper with a breathtaking view of Toronto's downtown core. Segal, resplendent in a dark suit tucked around his ample girth and resembling a jolly uncle, was ready with an answer.

"We're more comfortably the party of the underdog," he claimed. To Segal, the Liberals were the acme of the Establishment. And while he admired Tommy Douglas and David Lewis as great human rights advocates, he was turned off the NDP's state interventionist policies.

Segal also liked Diefenbaker's unstinting pro-Israel record, a thesis he elaborated upon in a 1970 article in the Canadian Zionist. And he admired the Conservatives' support for dissidents, Jews and non-Jews, in Communist regimes.

Segal looks back with ambivalence to Joe Clark's 1979 promise to move the Canadian embassy in Israel from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. Clark, the would-be prime minister, was "trying to do the right thing" with his surprising proposal. "It wasn't a bad idea in terms of policy," mused Segal, who has visited Israel three times. "But the timing was bad," coming as it did on the eve of an election and exposing the Conservatives to accusations of pandering to Jewish voters.

If Segal had his way, Canada would build a huge consulate in Jerusalem now, thereby offending no one, and convert it into a full-fledged embassy at the propitious moment.

Despite the disrepute into which Mulroney has fallen since his resignation, Segal has glowing words of praise for his ex-boss, whom he served as chief of staff in the early 1990s. Not only was Mulroney "the most effective Conservative prime minister of the century," but he was "instinctively and very strongly pro-Israel." And his appointment of Norman Spector as Canada's first Jewish ambassador to Israel was a barrier breaker.

By his own admission, Segal never took seriously his chances of winning the Conservative leadership nomination. True, several cabinet ministers asked him to run, but Segal had no illusions. "Their interest in me was more about Campbell than me."

In any event, he doubts whether he could have defeated Campbell at the party convention. But Segal feels the Conservatives would have acquitted themselves better in the election had he, rather than Campbell, led the party. Once Segal decided the job was not for him, he backed Jean Charest, the present Conservative leader. Still, he appreciates that Conservatives in the Jewish community were "very supportive" of his never-to-be candidacy.

When I wondered whether he could envisage the ascendancy of a Jewish prime minister in the future, the normally voluble, smooth-as-silk political operator paused for what seemed like an eternity. "The answer is, I'm not sure," he began.

But then, brightening up, he said: "The party wouldn't care about the religious affiliation of any of its candidates, and the country is beyond that kind of small-mindedness, though that doesn't mean we have no small-minded people."

The real question, he said, is whether a "minority faith" candidate could balance national interests. In his view, the matter is not even debatable. "I don't believe that my faith or my background would make me less capable of doing that."

A few moments later, he said, "But how comfortable would the Jewish community be with a Jewish prime minister?"

Segal is anything but certain that a Canadian Jew will lead the nation any time soon. "Statistically, the number of Jews involved in high-profile political positions is such that it's unlikely there will be a Jewish prime minister in my lifetime." But, hedging his bets, he observed, "It's not impossible."

Segal, who claims he has experienced not even a smidgen of anti-Semitism in 30 years in politics, is married to the former Donna Armstrong, a graduate nurse and health care consultant.

Although they were wed in a Reform ceremony, his wife did not convert to Judaism. "I respect her faith and she respects mine." Their daughter, Jacqueline, is exposed to Judaism and Christianity and will make her own decision regarding religious affiliation.

"It's not an issue between my wife and myself," noted Segal, a member of Kingston's Ir Ha Melech Congregation. And chuckling, he said in typical fashion, "Quite frankly, I'd be more worried if she married a Liberal."

Independence Day's well done

Normally, science fiction films are not my cup of tea. They're usually just too hokey for my sensibility. But Independence Day, which opened recently at Cineplex Odeon theatres, is different from all the others in the genre.

A summer blockbluster, Independence Day recycles a well-worn plot: an alien invasion of our planet. It's far-fetched, of course, but it's also reasonably intelligent, imaginative, unexpectedly humorous and beautifully crafted. The special effects alone are worth the price of admission.

For Jewish moviegoers, Independence Day offers a little bit extra. The heroes — an African-American combat pilot (Will Smith) and a Jewish computer scientist (Jeff Goldblum) — help save the universe from annihilation. Before Goldblum embarks on the do-or-die mission, his grizzled father (Judd Hirsch) hands him a velvet yarmulke and a prayer book, which he accepts sheepishly.

Hirsch provides much of the comic relief. In a scene which takes place in a bomb shelter, Hirsch, a kippah on his head, invites a neighbor to share a blessing. "I'm not Jewish," he says. "Nobody's perfect," replies Hirsch nonchalantly.

The subtext of this film is that we're all better off when we set aside our "petty differences" and pull together in the interest of an overriding cause. In this spirit, Israel and its Arab adversaries join an international coalition, organized by the United States, to fight off the technically advanced monsters from afar.

So the question is posed: Will it take a calamity for peace to descend on the Middle East?

Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI MICHAEL WOLFF

I recently had the pleasure of attending a party honoring someone for professional work on behalf of the Jewish community. What impressed me was that the speakers all praised those who work for the Jewish community, not for the money and not for the kavod, but for the good of the community.

This type of tribute beautifully expresses what love of G-d and of the Jewish community truly is.

Ethics of the Fathers, chapter 5, Mishneh 19, teaches us that two forms of love exist. The first has a physical basis and is conditional, what can be understood as love of an object. When the object ceases to be, then the love also ceases.

The second kind of love is unconditional, love which is given freely, a love that should link two individuals one to another. This is a love where the "other" is an extension of oneself.

The Torah portion of Ekev in Deuteronomy, which is found immediately after the second paragraph of the Shema in the daily service, talks about unconditional love. Chapter 11, verse 22 says that if you observe the mitzvah to love G-d, to walk in His ways and to cling to Him, then G-d will cause you to inherit the land of Israel.

The commentaries on the verse try to explain the mitzvah of "loving G-d." On the whole, they agree that "loving G-d" is a concept of unconditional love fulfilled through acts of caring and kindness and helping others. Closeness to G-d and love of G-d are basically love for one's fellow. It is a notion of selflessness to extend oneself in a concern for others. One does not treat others like objects, but as if everyone is special and important in his or her own right.

One gives to and works for the Jewish people because one cares. Motivation and fulfilment both stem from how much one can give of oneself. This is an "unconditional love" for the Jewish community.

When we all realize that working for the community is observing the mitzvah demanded of us to "love G-d," then we will all inherit the land promised to us.

Penance for a pogrom

By TOM WOOD

Guest Voices

One calls upon the lessons of eighth grade wrestling practice at the strangest moments, as when in a melee with two drunk Poles on the floor of a train, on the way back to Warsaw from the site of a pogrom.

It wasn't much of a fight. The wild gleam in the eyes of one of them as he picked me out of the crowd and silently approached, along with the way he shifted his grip on the bottle, telegraphed his intentions. I deflected the bottle as he swung it at my head; warm, sweet-smelling wine sloshed over the mother and child next to me.

I took both lads to be off-duty soldiers on a bender, because of their muscular builds and close-cropped hair. But they weren't in top fighting form at the moment. After a few seconds of grappling on the floor, I was sitting on top of the two of them. It helps to weigh 250 pounds in such situations.

If only I had been wearing a yarmulke, like so many at the commemoration I had just left in Kielce, I would have had a much juicier story. But I am neither a Jew nor a Pole – rather, theoretically, a disinterested student of the troubled attempts of these two peoples to live together in the same country, or even on the same planet. The almost farcical attack had nothing to do with what I was doing in Kielce, but it evoked a torrent of images.

Two hours earlier, I had stood by the grave of the 42 Jews killed by Poles in the July 4, 1946 Kielce Pogrom. There, World Jewish Congress Vice-President Kalman Sultanik recalled the time just after the war when Poles attacked the train in which he was riding. His words reminded me that several Jews were murdered on trains in the Kielce area around the time of the pogrom, and called to mind the oft-cited 1940 report of Polish Underground emissary, Jan Karski, who saw Poles shoving Jews from their seats and beating them on trains early in the German occupation period.

When the conductor came to our car (someone having pulled the emergency brake), he shrugged at the spectacle on the floor and walked away. Other passengers and I managed to push the drunks into an empty bar car (the bar was closed), and then hold the door shut as they tried to get at us again. In Warsaw, they stumbled off.

The conductor's neglect was a small-scale echo of the indifference among the authorities and bystanders whose memory Elie Wiesel lashed in his speech in Kielce. Standing before the apartment house where the pogrom took place, Wiesel said he did not believe in collective guilt. "But how was it possible," he asked, "that a huge, frenzied mob was allowed to kill and go on killing Jews for almost an entire day?"

The pogrom was a coda to the Holocaust era. Before July 1946, there was still a chance that the Jewish remnant in Poland could return to a semblance of normal life, though the flight to British-held Palestine was already well underway. After the rampage against Kielce's Poles – inflamed by a blood libel – all parties knew that the millennium-long experiment of Polish-Jewish coexistence was over. Ultimately, about 100,000 Jews fled to the West or Palestine.

The anniversary came at a time of mounting tension between Jews and Poles. Not only does the geographic barrier between Poland and the world's centres of Jewish population not diminish the enmity, it seems to increase it. But the tiny Jewish community in Poland seems more at ease with the Poles than with Jews from America or Israel.

When vandals knocked over 66 tombstones in Warsaw's Jewish Cemetery in late June, cemetery director Boleslaw Szenicer expressed outrage – as did many Poles. But Szenicer told Gazeta Wyborcza that when he took a group of about 60 young Jews from New York through part of the cemetery the day after he discovered the damage, he didn't mention it. "I was afraid they would take it as a symptom of Polish anti-Semitism, and would think of nothing else after returning home," he said.

Szenicer later told me that he had shown the vandalized area to another group of Jews the next day because they were Warsaw natives and "they will understand."

In February, the Polish government issued a formal apology for the Kielce Pogrom, acknowledging it as an act of Polish anti-Semitism. But Edward Moskal, president of the Chicago-based Polish American Congress, condemned the government's "submissiveness" to Jewish desires.

And in Kielce itself, a sprawling provincial city that became an arms manufacturing centre under communism, the penitent gestures of the local and national governments are met with a mixed response. Although some residents have written anguished letters of proxy-contrition to the papers, every Pole I meet says the pogrom was a "Communist provocation," as though that would excuse five percent of the population from being part of the mob in front of the building.

Still, the city's conciliatory gestures – a play about the pogrom, educational initiatives about it in the schools, plaques unveiled and wreaths laid – draw praise from Yale Reisner, a Warsaw-based official of the Ronald Lauder Foundation, which supports the current, modest renascence of Jewish life in Eastern Europe.

"The flip side," Reisner says, "is that there was an attack on Gypsies in Kielce last week." Police did intervene to nip it in the bud.

"Kielce has a bit of a reputation as a rowdy town," Reisner added, in a talk a few days before I went there. Now I know what he meant.

A Song Will Remain by S. Simchovitch, Lugus Publications $18.95 (paper)

Simcha Simchovitch is widely admired as an accomplished poet, novelist and scholar. He is also known as the former librarian and curator of Toronto's Beth Tzedek Synagogue library and Judaica Museum.

The book under review is a notable achievement, a volume of 159 poems that reach out to sensitive and questing readers, that speak both to mind and heart. Most of these poems are translated by the author from Yiddish into English, a few are translated by others. But the majority, however, are in original English verse.

No other Canadian Yiddish poet has been able to make this remarkably smooth and effective transition from one language to another. Yiddish literature is especially difficult to translate because it contains a host of historical references, cultural assumptions and religious symbols.

The author is aware of the perils of entering into the intricacies of a new language. "Like a child that weaves on his tiny feet/and walks, and falls, and trys again/I try anew my pen/in English."

These accessible poems deal with a wide variety of subjects: pre-Holocaust recollections of his experiences in the Polish shtetl of his childhood, life in Kirghizia, the middle Asian Soviet Republic where he lived in relative peace during most of the war years, and his more than four decades as a staunch and proud Torontonian.

The sole survivor of his town of 12,000 Jews, he recalls that day in August 1942, when they were dispatched in freight trains to Treblinka. "Such a city it was, with life and youth,/their joy and sorrow, song and laughter/ like a wheat field waving, sugring./ Now names remain, only names,/ in a book between dark covers — / a remembrance for all the generations."

Cruelty and inhumanity can be transcended as hope, insistent and triumphant, prevails. "Even though the calamity pulsates/in every vein of my being,/and the pits, the mass-graves/ which I have evaded/like a shadow follow me,/ still I want/ to exult in human joy,/ to live and live,/ and even to forgive."

Toronto, sings the author, is a grand village, a metropolis of steel and glass structures, of quiet and tumultous streets, squares and boulevards. In an ironic mood he warns his fellow citizens to beware of venturing into a forbidden park. "Beware of dogs! Do not say/ you weren't warned beforehand./ Do not impede respectful men/ who socialize in leisure/ guarded by dogs and barbed wire,/ in the name of laissez-faire."

Singing the uniqueness of every individual, inveighing against the meaningless of war, exalting the love that sustains and transfigures those wounded and scarred by life, the poet remains eternally optimistic. "A Torah scroll/ is every human being,/ a holy candle is every life,/ for the Maker alone/ to quench./ Unique, one-time miracle/ of blood and flesh and spirit,/ by eternal grace - / alive and effervescent."

Finally, the poet reminds the steadfast Earth that has nourished him for more than seven decades that he has not betrayed the essential core of his being as a caring individual. "Bear witness that I did not/ squander your precious gifts./ to truth and beauty/ as to an irresistible light/ I was drawn./ And always, everywhere,/ I sought to soothe/ in my humble way/ human pain and misery/ of my tormented century."

I have read these poems aloud to family and friends to their enjoyment and enhancement of spirit. This volume, a lasting contribution to Canadian Jewish poetry, should become part of your library.

A marriage made in cyber-Heaven

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

With Tisha b'Av over, we leave the saddest part of the calendar behind us and turn to one of the most joyous (and least known) holidays on the Jewish Highway – Tu b'Av.

The 15th of Av may not have the fame of Passover or Chanukah (although you can find reference to it on the Web at [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/holidays/tubav/] and [ftp://www.torah.org/pub/classes/yomtov/fav/].) But listen to what the Mishna says: "There were no greater holidays for Israel than Tu b'Av and Yom Kippur, for on them the girls of Jerusalem used to go out in borrowed white dresses... and dance in the vineyards.

"What would they say? Young man, lift up your eyes and see what you choose for yourself." (Ta'anit 4:8)

Tu b'Av was the traditional festival for courting. These days, you don't see many "girls of Jerusalem" borrowing white dresses and dancing in the vineyards. But in recent years, Tu b'Av has been rekindled as a day on which Jewish men and women search for their shidduch.

Which is a roundabout way of bringing me to this week's topic: The Internet as shadchan.

Okay, so the Jewish Highway doesn't have as much personality as a real-life matchmaker. And I don't think Sholom Aleichem would have been inspired to write about a computer network. But the Internet has become a very popular place to reach out and try to meet your bashert.

All types of matchmakers have hung their shingles on the Internet from Israel's Ark Electronic Shadchenter [http://www.arkline.com/] to Thornhill, Ontario's Orthodox Connection [http://www.the-wire.com/shadchan/] to Miami's Jewish Quality Singles [http://www.thenet.net/singles/service.htm]. Some of these rely on the skills of traditional matchmakers. Others are on-line services that charge a fee to have your photograph and interests posted on the Internet.

It doesn't stop there. There are many sites like LoveLink Israel [http://www.agmonet.co.il/agmonet/1date/main/lovepass.htm] where you can carry on live (typed) conversations. And there are on-line magazines like IN Montreal [http://www.accent.net/in-mtl/]. Although not exactly a "singles" magazine, this nicely-designed site is aimed at Jewish adults 18 to 35 years olds in the Montreal area.

There are many other sites devoted to Jewish singles. The Ultimate Link Launcher's People: Singles & Personals [http://ucsu.colorado.edu/~jsu/people.html#socrel] has links to over 50 other sites. As does the Jewish Singles Connection WWW Cyber Community [http://www.zdepth.com/jsc/] which has additional links to travel and outdoor clubs, Hillel Houses and other campus organizations.

Both those sites even allow you to create your own free personal ad and browse through others'. (But be careful. Just as you wouldn't print your phone number in a newspaper personal, be cautious about the information you make public through the Internet.)

Maybe Internet dating isn't for you. But just because you aren't using the Jewish Highway to find your match doesn't mean someone else can't do it for you. Parents of Adults Jewish Singles [gopher://gopher.jer1.co.il:70/11/jorgs/npo/pajes] publishes a National Registry of Adult Jewish Singles. For a fee, their directory will list your available son, daughter, niece, nephew or cousin.

And who knows where all this will lead? These are still new technologies but the Israel Couple Page [http://lynx.neu.edu/home/httpd/d/dweinber/2.html#success] already lists nine engaged or married couples who met on the Net.

Marriages made in Cyber-Heaven! Oy what would Yente say?

CTV's Dana Lewis finds Mideast coverage exciting

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With his well-modulated voice and unruffled appearance, Dana Lewis is a familiar face to many Canadian television viewers. As CTV's Jerusalem-based Middle East bureau chief since November 1992 and a Gulf War correspondent before that, the 37-year-old journalist has reported from Syria, Jordan, Egypt, Qatar, Kuwait and Lebanon.

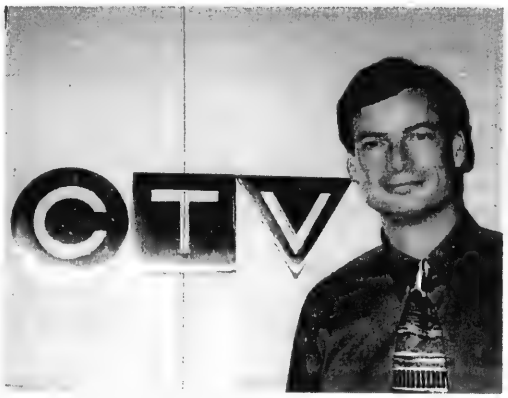
"It's exciting," Lewis said during a recent two-week working vacation in Toronto, an unabashedly enthusiastic tone entering his voice as he recalled why he entered journalism in the first place. His career, which began at a London, Ont., radio station in 1978, has included five years at CBC-TV in Edmonton and a stint as CTV's Western bureau chief.

As a journalist, "you get to go and talk to real people every day. You can go and fight for the little guy and people who are really in need, and give them a voice. It's so rewarding to go and tell the stories of people. I just wish we had more time to give them."

An experienced war correspondent, Lewis values highly the telling of both sides of a story.

"We do not have an agenda," he stressed. "We try to be really balanced."

Although media bias has been a concern of the viewing public, Lewis explained that news media face "a constant struggle" to avoid being manipulated by sources.



A familiar face and a familiar logo: Dana Lewis, CTV's Middle East bureau chief, was in Toronto recently. [Frances Kraft photo]

"We try to go to the front line" to round out information in videos supplied by diverse sources.

Lewis, a native of Toronto, said he feels very comfortable travelling to places like Gaza and the West Bank, "providing people know who we are."

Recently, he faced heavy shelling from Israel when he reported from Lebanon during Operation Grapes of Wrath, but he felt that to do his job properly, it was important to be there.

Despite the initial need to adjust to a military presence and a preponderance of weapons in Israel, "there's another side to everyday life which is quite beautiful and quite normal," Lewis said.

He admitted, however, that this year's spate of bus bombings, one of which occured right outside CTV's Jerusalem office, has disrupted his sleep and caused him nightmares.

"I've been to every single bus bombing. I saw body parts in trees and stepped through blood. It's been dirty. It's been very violent, very sad. Innocent people should not be targeted. That is terrorism. We're not talking about a front-line battle."

Cautious lest his remarks be misconstrued, Lewis emphasized that his words "by no means [constitute] a statement on the Palestinian struggle."

From Lewis' perspective, the past six months in Israel have been "tough. So much happens [there] that six months ago seems like a long time ago."

Reluctantly succumbing to journalistic cliche, Lewis has to admit, "I really have had a ringside seat at an amazing time in history."

Holocaust survivor's son makes visit to Germany

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It was with a heavy heart that Bernie Farber agreed to be the staff member accompanying Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) president Goldie Hershon on an official visit to Germany, paid for by the German government.

The son of Holocaust survivors, Farber had avoided visiting Germany until then.

"It was a difficult trip, laden with emotion," he told the CJC Ontario region executive recently.

This was even more true when, at a tracing centre for Holocaust survivors, he asked for any entries under the name of Farber and was brought a thick file.

"The fourth card I picked up was about my own father. There it was, all the details of his life. It was quite a shock."

Farber, CJC director of community relations, stayed at the same hotel in Weimar where Adolf Hitler made the famous balcony speech proclaiming himself to be Germany's fuhrer. This also sent chills up and down his spine, as did a visit the next day to the Buchenwald concentration camp 20 miles away.

"There is always a cold rain with fog surrounding Buchenwald and we learned that the Germans deliberately picked this spot for the prisoners and also deliberately avoided using the Weimar name for the camp," Farber said.

Germany is taking stronger action against Holocaust deniers than Canada, he said, citing the case of Ernst Zundel as an example.

After visiting synagogues in Berlin and other parts of Germany, Farber said German Jews no longer feel the tensions of three or four years ago, but still have unanswered questions hanging over their heads.

"They're not at the point where they can say all is well."

There is also a struggle between the Jews of east and west Berlin, he said, over who should get most of the money the German government raises by levies to give to minority groups.

Full report on Goldie Hershon's visit in upcoming issue of The Canadian Jewish News.

NIF president aims to increase group's visibility

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The New Israel Fund of Canada (NIFC) isn't exactly a household name here — in fact, that's its biggest weakness, according to Ralph Garber, the organization's new national president.

"It's not recognized here. In the United States it's much more visible," he said in a recent interview.

A recently organized communications committee will be dealing with that issue, he added.

In Toronto NIFC is probably best known for the annual feminist Sukkot service, Succah-by-the-Water, held under its auspices for the past four years at Harbourfront. The project has raised a total of over $100,000 to support women's projects in Israel, such as rape crisis shelters, which receive NIF grants.

The NIF, a joint effort of North Americans and Israelis, was established in 1979 to address social and economic issues in Israel.

Among the NIF projects that piqued Garber's interest initially was SHATIL, a Jerusalem-based organization which provides Israeli non-profit social change organization with free hands-on assistance in such areas as media relations, advocacy and fundraising.

"I found it particularly interesting because of its empowerment facilitation. It sort of fit my own Jewish and social work background."

Garber, 72, is a professor emeritus and former dean of the University of Toronto's Faculty of Social Work. A native of Montreal, he lived in the United States for 22 years before moving here in 1977.

He is currently finishing his term as president of the International Association of Schools of Social Work. Garber has lectured around the world, including two stints in Israel. During his stay in the States, he was a board member of the Jewish Federation in St. Louis and New Jersey, and president of the United Way in New Jersey.

For him, the New Israel Fund represents "a form of new Zionism" which has its roots in "the original idea of a peaceful state, liberal in the broadest meaning."

While the NIF is an apolitical organization, the recent election of Benjamin Netanyahu as prime minister of Israel has raised concerns for its supporters about religious pluralism, women's equality, Jewish-Arab coexistence and civil rights in Israel. Those aspects are the focus of NIF work.

"If the new government is not going to be hospitable to some of our ideas, we'll have to work harder," said Garber.

Community groups press for Nemsila's deportation

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lawyers for Jewish community groups and the federal government recently urged a Federal Court judge not to forget the victims of Nazi horrors when he ruled on whether to grant a stay of proceedings in a case involving an alleged Slovak war criminal.

Granting a stay in the Josef Nemsila deportation case could turn Canada into a legally-sanctioned haven for Nazi war criminals and bring the administration of justice in Canada into disrepute, they argued.

A March 1 letter from Ted Thompson, assistant deputy minister of justice, to Chief Justice Julius Isaac of the Federal Court should not disqualify every judge of the court from hearing war crimes cases, lawyer Ed Morgan told the court.

Morgan was serving as counsel for Canadian Jewish Congress, one of four Jewish community interveners in the case. The Simon Wiesenthal Centre, B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights and Ken Narvey on behalf of a group of Montreal congregations each argued the Nemsila case should proceed despite a letter and subsequent meeting between Thompson and Isaac.

The interveners and Justice Department lawyers asked Federal Court Judge Paul Rouleau to consider the enormity of the crimes allegedly perpetrated by Nemsila and weigh that against the issue of judges' independence.

Thompson and Isaac ought not to have met but that meeting shouldn't mean that "Nemsila can laugh and say I can get away with it," Justice Department lawyer Paul Evraire said.

Reciting Nemsila's alleged wartime activities, Evraire pointed out he served as a company commander with the Hlinka Guard from 1939-45. He was responsible for the arrest, deportation and execution of civilians in 1944. In December 1947 he was convicted by a Czech court of killing resistance fighters and he served two years in custody before escaping to Austria. Nemsila immigrated to Canada in 1950, claiming he had been a farmer during the war.

The theme of balancing society's interests was taken up by the interveners. John B. Laskin, representing the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, said "it would be the cruelist irony if Nemsila, who once evaded Canadian justice, would again be permitted to avoid justice by exploiting the error of a government official."

"Where's the logic of punishing the victim for what [Isaac and Thompson] did? Why should the victims be made to suffer for this?" asked David Matas, lawyer for the League for Human Rights.

"A letter from a lawyer to a judge is a far lesser wrong than mass murder" or of immunity from it, he added.

Morgan suggested Cullen erred when he said war crimes citizenship cases must be scrutinized with greater care than usual. In fact, the requirements of natural justice are greater when the penalty, such as imprisonment, is more severe, Morgan said.

The worst punishment facing alleged war criminals is that "they can live their lives in complete liberty, just not in Canada," he said.

Ron Poulton, co-counsel for Nemsila, said a reasonable person would perceive Thompson's actions as so egregiously wrong and tainting the independence of the court that only halting the proceedings would remedy it.

Entertainment leader dies

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Leonard Bernstein, a prominent member of Toronto's movie industry, died of cancer last week. He was 75.

Bernstein was an active and very popular member of the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC), where he was especially known for his work with the chapel. In 1975, he and his brother Coleman refurbished the chapel, which is dedicated to their late brother Michael, who was killed on active service during World War II.

After his graduation from Central Commerce, Bernstein was unable to get a job in accounting because of his religion, according to his son Jeffrey, and he joined the well-known Allen family movie business and Columbia Pictures franchise. Later, he worked with Premier Theatres as vice-president and general manager.

He held leadership positions in several industry associations, including the Canadian Motion Picture Theatre Owners Association, and the Motion Picture Pioneers Trust Fund.

During World War II, he served overseas in the Royal Canadian Air Force.

He also served on the boards of Associated Hebrew Schools and Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, and was active in the Jewish Boy Scout movement.

While he and his family had always been involved with the Bloor JCC, after his retirement he became active. He pumped life into the chapel, arranging for rabbis, cantors and special speakers, picking up congregants, buying bread, herring and smoked fish for kiddushes, often with his own money, according to close friend Sydney Greenstein.

"He brought a sense of warmth," Greenstein told The CJN.

Toronto Star columnist David Lewis Stein, who davened with Bernstein at the Bloor JCC chapel, called him "a very fine man, who set an example for all of us. He was always involved in helping others."

Others spoke of his strong sense of values, of his spending hours and hours distributing latkes to Jewish residents in nursing homes, and of his work in visiting the sick.

"He will be remembered for a long time," Jeffrey Bernstein said.

Bernstein is survived by his wife Lillian, brother Coleman, children Michael, Jeffrey and Deborah, and five grandchildren.

Correction

There were errors in the article "Spector traces family's roots in Germany." (CJN, July 18).

The initials J.S. carved into the stone were of Spector's cousin Joseph Swarcz, and were in the courtyard of his home in Gladbach. The house which the current owner claimed was bought in 1939 was Joseph's parents' home in Gladbach.

The impression may have been given that Spector came from Germany with her family. In fact, she was born in Oshawa.

The CJN regrets these errors.

Hangings discussed in the camp, says former clerk

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A former clerk in the administration office at the Salaspils concentration camp said he heard "talk" of prisoners being hanged but that he did not see any killings despite having an office near the camp's central square where a gallows was located.

Rolands Bahsteins said "there were talks about it, but that was a kind of general conversation." He said it was people outside the camp who talked about hangings but he personally couldn't confirm or deny that such hangings took place.

Bahsteins, who served as a clerk and interpreter at Salaspils for more than six months in 1943, said the camp's guard unit was under the command of Konrads Kalejs. He said that during his tour of duty at Salaspils, he sometimes saw Kalejs on a daily basis.

Bahsteins' testimony was recently shown on videotape at Kalejs' deportation hearing. His testimony was recorded in 1987 in Latvia as part of the U.S. Justice Department's case against Kalejs. Kalejs was ordered removed from the United States for his persecuting civilians during the war as a member of the collaborationist Arajs Kommando. He came to Canada in 1994.

Bahstein's testimony is consistent with that of other witnesses who identified Kalejs as commander of the guard unit at the Salaspils concentration camp near Riga.

However Bahsteins appeared reluctant in his testimony, giving terse answers to questions and failing to remember many details of the camp.

He said he served as a typing clerk at the camp's headquarters and worked on routine matters like food and leave requisitions. Occasionally, he'd translate conversations between the Latvians in the camp and their German overseers, but the conversations were "common ... There was nothing special."

Despite having an office inside the camp perimeter, close to the square where prisoners were executed, he said he didn't see any hangings and that the only talk of hangings was by people outside the camp. He said he didn't know how these people learned of the killings.

Bahsteins, who deserted when he thought the war was lost, said the "guards who escorted prisoners to work places handled them brutally." The guards were members of Kalejs' company.

In other evidence, former Arajs Kommando member Viktors Ennitis testified he served as a watchtower guard at Salaspils from July to December 1942 and that Kalejs was the senior lieutenant in charge of his guard unit.

In the event of an escape attempt, he was under standing orders to first fire a warning shot and if the escape continues, "to shoot the person."

Ennitis, whose testimony was also recorded in Latvia in 1987, said the camp had a central square where prisoners were gathered and where "punishment" was meted out. A gallows was located in the square and "there was one case, there were two people of the Jewish nationality ... and they were accused of doing something wrong, of illegal selling, and then [the German commander] Lange came and the death sentence was carried out."

Ennitis said he saw Kalejs present at the execution but that he did not give any orders.

On other occasions, the square was "the place they administered floggings, beatings with a club" although he said he did not see any of the beatings.

Ennitis said part of his duty was to escort about 22 prisoners outside the camp to a swamp where they dug up stumps. "The prisoners did not get anything (food) during this time," which lasted from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m., he said.

Unlike Bahsteins, who said he didn't see any Jews in Salaspils, Ennitis testified Jews were present.

Ennitis said he asked to be transferred from Salaspils to the front: "I didn't like Salaspils ... I didn't want to watch all the suffering. When we joined the army, we thought we'd have to fight the enemy at the front."

He said Kalejs agreed to his transfer.

Kalejs' hearing has been adjourned to mid-August. Further dates have been set throughout the month of September.

BJC honors late athlete

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ben Raider, a popular all-around athlete and member of the Jewish Community Centre for 50 years, will be honored by the installation of a fitness testing machine at the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

The new machine, costing $3,000, will enable BJC staff to prescribe individual diets and physical regimes based on the information fed into it on body fat and other physical attributes. The test will take about 20 minutes to complete.

Contributions are being sought to cover the purchase of the machine. Income tax receipts for full amounts will be issued. In addition, contributions will be acknowledged on a memorial plaque.

Recalling that Raider suffered a heart attack 20 years ago and gradually built up his health again, director Jim Emery said Raider's regimen of physical exercise "gave him another 20 years."

An active member and volunteer, Raider belonged to the original Y on Brunswick Avenue, and then to the Bloor Street branch.

Prime Minister Netanyahu: Don't Turn Back the Clock on Religious Freedom!

During his recent visit to North America, Prime Minister Netanyahu was received – as he should have been – with warmth and respect. But he provided no convincing assurances that religious freedom in Israel is not jeopardized by deals with the ultra-Orthodox parties in his coalition. Indeed, the New Israel Fund and its thousands of supporters throughout North America and in Israel remain deeply concerned over the threats to religious pluralism inherent in measures to which the new government appears committed.

Government policy and judicial decisions of recent years brought Israel several small steps closer to granting equal status to the Conservative and Reform branches of Judaism, affecting the lives of thousands of Israelis in matters related to conversion, burial, and religious education. Negating this progress by returning to the anachronistic "Status Quo", to which key elements of the Netanyahu government are militantly dedicated, would delegitimize the beliefs, practices, and aspirations of many Israelis and the vast majority of Diaspora Jews. To do so would, in effect, make most of us second-class Jews in Israel.

Coercive laws and regulations do not promote Judaism or love of Torah. They will not bring a single person to the doors of the synagogue. They will only lead to a further backlash against religion in Israel and continue to fray the ties that bind North American Jews to Israel.

The New Israel Fund is the principal supporter of Israeli grassroots organizations working to strengthen democracy and build civil society. As part of a broad spectrum of North American and Israeli organizations comprising both religious and secular members, we call upon Mr. Netanyahu to respect pluralism and reject coercion. Do not allow Jewish fundamentalists to turn back the clock on religious freedom!

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Three Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) students were finalists in Halleluyah 1996, a worldwide song contest for Jewish youth, aimed at promoting Hebrew and Israeli songs in the Diaspora.

This was the first time that the contest was held in Toronto. It was sponsored by Youth & Hechalutz Department, Canadian Zionist Federation; Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto action committee for Jewish continuity; Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation; Toronto Council of Hazzanim and Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

Marina Olhovsky, lyricist, Leora Raivich, singer and Jonathan Shapero, composer and piano accompanist, all going into Grade 10 at CHAT, first performed their song, entitled Ir Ha'Etanim (The Enduring City) at Beth Tikvah Synagogue and then went on to perform in the community celebration following the Walk to Israel.

Olhovsky, who lived in Ukraine until she was 12 years old and then in Israel for two years before her family moved to Canada, wrote the lyrics after CHAT announced they were running an original song contest about Jerusalem. She later approached Shapero and Raivich to write the music and record the song.

"Israel left a very deep impression on me, and writing poetry has always been my favorite hobby, so when the contest was announced it was inevitable that I would enter," says Olhovsky.

"We had only two days to put the whole thing together before we had to perform for the school but it really was not difficult. I have spent time in Jerusalem and I think that helped. One has to be inspired to write a song and after being in Jerusalem, it was easy to get inspired," says Shapero, who, as well as writing music, plays piano, keyboard and guitar. He is also part of a trio that goes out to schools to perform and encourage students to keep up their musical studies.

Raivich, whose parents are from Latvia, was born in Calgary and came to Toronto with her family in 1985. She began formal singing lessons in 1991 and is spending part of her summer doing musical theatre in Vancouver.

directors in Lake Ontario Region (comprising southern Ontario as well as Buffalo and Rochester, N.Y.) and Laurentian Region (Quebec). As well, the full-time director in Red River Region (Winnipeg) has been made part-time.

There have been no changes in Northwest Canada Region (Alberta and Saskatchewan). And British Columbia was never part of BBYO Canada or B'nai Brith.

As a result of the changes, all four Canadian BBYO regions may revert to supervision from the United States, as was the case for years.

"There will be no more national decisions," Sokolsky told The CJN. "And there will be a loss of Canadian identity. We've tried so hard to be distinct from the United States. The kids aren't overly worried, but this paints a grim picture.

"It's tragic and short-sighted, but that's the sorry reality of today."

Regions are also reorganized

BBYO is the world's largest Jewish youth organization, with about 1,200 teenaged members in Canada. In this country, it was once funded by B'nai Brith Canada (BBC). But in 1991, BBC, faced with a $3.5-million debt, cut off all money and told the group to fend for itself. It was a move whose repercussions, many say, are still being felt today. Despite BBC's withdrawal, BBYO kept its name.

The regions then affiliated with local federations and Jewish community centres, and raised funds from alumni, parents, individual B'nai Brith lodges and the public.

In 1993, BBYO International set up BBYO Canada in order to tap Canadian funds and for a while, it worked. "There was stability," Sokolsky said.

But now "decisions will be missing a certain voice."

In a separate development, Miriam Pilc-Levine, the full-time director of Canada's largest BBYO district, Lake Ontario Region, has also been dismissed.

As well, the region will be reorganized to put more emphasis on activities in Toronto, where 500 of the region's 600 members live.

In all, the changes are expected to save $65,000, says region chair Tom Lobel, with the savings to be spent on programming.

He said the changes will have "a very limited" effect on members. "I don't see it will make much difference. It's just a decision to focus funds to get a bigger bang for the buck. It makes a lot of sense."

The decison was taken, he said, because of declining membership and the expenses involved in serving members outside Toronto. The new arrangement will mean that services in Ottawa and Buffalo will go unchanged; Kingston will be serviced by Ottawa; and Hamilton and Kitchener will likely end up part of the Toronto membership. But supervision of the entire region will come from Washington.

Montreal's FEDERATION/CJA stopped funding the local BBYO chapter of 200 teens in April. The position of Laurentian Region director, held by Marla Usheroff, has also been terminated.

Usheroff was actually let go in May, but has stayed on because she's confident the region will be able to raise money privately.

She told The CJN that a notice explaining BBYO's plight has gone out to the community in Montreal and response has been good. Notably, two alumni, Ross Paperman and Emanuel Kalles, have taken the lead in fundraising.

Being supervised by Americans "is not what kids here need or want. Things have been very difficult here and Quebec Jewish youth need local supervision," Usheroff said.

She said a new "streamlined" region is ready to go back to the federation with a new plan.

Federation spokesperson Maxyne Finkelstein said the cutoff of funds was because "BBYO was not meeting its obligations, both in terms of fundraising and membership."

The federation cut its BBYO allocation of $40,000, while "under discussion" is a further cut of $11,000 from the YM-YWHA, Finkelstein added.

She said the federation "is not closed" to funding BBYO again one day.

Winnipeg JC&FS executive director moving to U.S.

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG – There comes a time for organizations and their executive directors, even the most popular of them, to part company and look to new blood and fresh challenges. That time has come for Barney Yellen after 15 years at the helm of Winnipeg's Jewish Child & Family Service. Yellen will be leaving the JC&FS at the end of September to assume the same position for the Jewish Family Services of New Haven, Connecticut.

Yellen is originally from the United States (Los Angeles). He came to Toronto 28 years ago to work in his lifelong field there. In Toronto, he met his wife, Penny (a past president of the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada), who was from Winnipeg. They came back here in part to look after her ailing father.

Under Yellen's direction, Winnipeg's JC&FS has been completely re-organized, gained accreditation and recognition in its field for its work. Yellen also leaves the organization on a sound financial footing.

The caseload is about 550, he reports, about 150 more than it used to be when he arrived. "Our task has become to meet the growing needs of the community with fewer resources," he says. "We have had to develop a number of innovative programs such as our volunteer program. We currently have about 180 volunteers."

Over the years as well, the focus of the JC&FS have shifted away from child welfare and more to the needs of the frail elderly.

The organization has supported the development and growth of the Aleph Bet Day Care and the Shalom Residences (for Jewish mentally handicapped adults). As well, the service helps recently arrived Bosnian Jews resettle.

Yellen reports that New Haven has a Jewish population of 24,000.

Its Jewish Family Services provides a range of services including foster care, mental health services, help to the aged and resettlement services.

The JC&FS is not the only Winnipeg Jewish community pillar that is losing its long time leader. Paul Silver, the president of the Vaad Ha'ir, died on July 8 after a three year struggle with cancer.

Silver, who was 64, had been president of the Vaad for seven years. A successful businessman, Silver contributed much of his time to the community. He was a past president of the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, a board member for 18 years, and the synagogue's only "life member". He also served as president of the Jewish National Fund and the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University and was a member of the Board of Governors of the Hebrew University.

Scouting conference encounters problems

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — Geula Joffe is disappointed.

The member of the national executive of the Israeli Boys and Girl Scout Federation expected relations between Israel and Arab nations attending the 29th World Conference of the World Association of Girl Guides and Girl Scouts to be smooth.

But as the sun peeked between the clouds in Wolfville, N.S., there was only gloom in her heart. "Before the peace process, we had problems with the Arab group at these conferences," said the 45-year-old Ramat Gan resident. "They would ignore us and we found that very difficult for guiding and scouting, because we're not the United Nations. We're just trying to make peace and train our members for understanding."

But she said she thought the Arab group would be more friendly in Wolfville, particularly after Israel initiated the peace process and had lost its prime minister. And at a recent World Scout conference in Oslo, Israel asked that the Palestinians be admitted as an associate member.

"After all this goodwill, and our effort to become friends and to act together and live in peace, I'm disappointed in the ladies here who are unwilling to talk to me. As guides and scouts, we do everything to promote peace. I hope soon there will be a change of attitude."

Joffe said she had a meeting arranged with one leader of the Arab group but "she never showed up. I was told by a member of the European delegation that she got cold feet."

Joffe is a retired corporate financial and accounting director. She is now doing volunteer work with children with disabilities and behavior problems, as well as serving as treasurer of the Scout Federation for the past nine years.

There are 20,000 guides and 50,000 scouts registered in Israel, members of the Hebrew Scout Association and five Israeli Arab associations. "There's no problem getting girls enthused," said Joffe. "Yet in the Arab world, there is the tradition that girls don't go out. We have to work hard to convince parents, even though girls want to join. We see differences between the girls and their parents. The children will wear modern clothes while the parents are more traditional."

She said programs are adjusted for the different communities but "we're doing it carefully. We believe that if the program is good, they'll join to gain the benefits."

The Scout and Guide Association runs summer camps, she said, and together the six groups are planting the Federation Forest near Nahalah where Moshe Dayan was born.

The Israeli scout movement is growing by about five to six percent a year, says Joffe. "We have found the underprivileged population is discovering scouting provides an education, and enjoyment when they join our group. Ethiopian refugees and Russian immigrants find that scouts help them with learning and make their life a bit easier. And if they can't afford membership, they can join without paying."

Joffe, the only Israeli delegate to the conference of more than 550 women from around the world, said a large portion of the Israeli scout movement's budget goes to security.

Montrealer heading to Singapore diplomatic post

OTTAWA — Barry Carin, assistant deputy minister of trade and economic policy in the Foreign Affairs Department, has been appointed High Commissioner to Singapore. He leaves Aug. 6.

A native of Montreal and a McGill University graduate, Carin, 50, first joined the federal civil service in 1971, serving with the Treasury Board Secretariat.

After earning a PhD in economics from Brown University, he became director of evaluation at the Treasury Board from 1974-77.

From 1978-80, Carin was an associate professor at the University of Victoria's School of Public Administration, and undertook several assignments for the British Columbia government.

In May 1980, he was appointed assistant deputy minister for program delivery at the Ministry of State for Social Development. In 1982, he was senior advisor for the Beaufort Sea study undertaken for the Departments of Energy, Mines and Resources and Indian and Northern Affairs.

Later that year, Carin returned to the Ministry of State for Social Development as deputy secretary for income support and transfer payments.

In 1984, he was appointed assistant deputy minister for strategic policy and planning with Employment and Immigration Canada.

Four years ago, he joined the External Affairs (now Foreign Affairs) Department as assistant deputy minister for economic policy and trade competitiveness.

In 1993, he assumed his current position, which also includes the position of G-7 Foreign Affairs Sous-Sherpa.

ONTARIO DRUG BENEFITS

IMPORTANT News for Seniors and People Receiving Social Assistance

Because the federal government has reduced transfer payments for Ontario's health and social services by $2.1 billion over the next two years, the Ontario government must act now to preserve its drug programs.

Starting July 15, Ontario Drug Benefit recipients will contribute a small amount toward their prescription costs. Ontario is the last province to introduce co-payments.

How much you pay depends on your income. You will pay up to $2 per prescription if you are:

- single, 65 or over, with a net income of less than $16,018 per year
- a couple, both over 65, with a combined net income of less than $24,175 per year
- living in a nursing home, home for the aged or home for special care
- receiving welfare or family benefits
- receiving home care

You're 65 and your income is higher than the above? Then you pay the first $100 of your drug costs each year. After that, you'll pay only the ODB dispensing fee of up to $6.11 per prescription.

You have extra health insurance from a private company? Call your company. It may cover co-payment costs.

Call the Ministry of Health at 1-888-405-0405 if you have more questions. Or look for information sheets at your pharmacy.

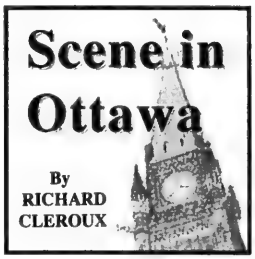
There's more than economics involved in this trade deal



OTTAWA — Canada's relations with Israel will be getting back closer to normal this week with the signature of the Canada-Israel Free Trade agreement.

The deal will be worth about $100 million a year in trade for each country as 10 percent and 20 percent tarrifs are gradually eliminated.

But there's more than economics involved here. Relations between Canada and Israel were chilled last spring when Benjamin Netanyahu's Likud government came to power.

The signing of the free trade agreement was to have taken place last spring, but it was put on hold until after the Israeli elections. There was talk however, that the agreement might never be signed at all, depending on what the new Israeli government did.

We're not back to normal yet. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Ottawa still has "under review" its participation in the multilateral peace negotiations by which Canada and other nations help resettle refugees in the Middle East, build housing for them and promote economic development as part of the Oslo accords.

The Canadian government still doesn't trust Netanyahu ... completely. He and some of the people behind him said things in the heat of the Israeli election campaign that worry the Canadian government.

Canada will watch a number of key issues — how the Netanyahu government handles the Middle East peace process, how it treats Palestinians and whether it lifts restrictions on Jewish settlements in the West Bank.

Only after it has seen a clear direction from the new Israeli government will Canada consider any major policy changes. This gives the new Israeli government plenty of time as it contemplates its options and decides which of its election promises it will honor, and which ones it can put off for a while.

Nothing is expected publicly from Ottawa at the earliest until after the U.S. elections in November. Canada will not cause trouble for President Bill Clinton at this time by announcing anything that could be misinterpreted by some Arab nations (the ones who always see Canada as America's errand boy in the Middle East).

The Chrétien government was never as blatant as the Clinton administration in favoring Shimon Peres over Netanyahu in the recent Israeli elections. Thank goodness for Canada, given that Netanyahu won. The United States could afford to take sides. It gives Israel so much money. Canada could never afford to do the same.

Netanyahu has been quick to forget and forgive, possibly because Israel still depends such a great deal on the U.S. largesse.

Fully 45 percent of the massive U.S. foreign aid budget goes to Israel and Egypt — more than $20 billion a year!

Right now the Canadian government is in the process of discovering that Netanyahu may not be the "enemy of the peace process" that Peres' Labor government had us believe. Maybe he won't further the peace process, but perhaps he will not destroy it as Canada had been led to believe.

Although Netanyahu did not rush out the day after the election to shake Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat's hand, he has come a long way. For one thing, he no longer equates the PLO with the Nazis. That's a start. A comparison to the Hezbollah and Hamas options may have helped put things in perspective for him.

Just before the May 29 vote in Israel, in what was a last minute bid by the Liberal government in Ottawa to get on the good side of Netanyahu, Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy said in an interview with the Toronto Star that Canada would favor the creation of a Palestinian state if the "security" of Israel was to be guaranteed. (Read Likud party policy).

Until then Canada's position had been that Canada favored the creation of a Palestinian state if it was "decided" through negotiations by the parties involved. (Read Labor party policy).

The nuance hardly changed any votes in Israel, but it is something that Axworthy can point to if Netanyahu ever decides to visit Canada.

In June, Arafat's Palestinian Authority jailed civil rights dissident Dr. Eyad Sarraj after he told the New York Times that Arafat's government was "corrupt, dictatorial and oppressive" and that he had felt "100 times freer" under Israeli occupation.

Sarraj, a psychiatrist, heads a civil rights group called the Independent Commission on Citizen's Rights which has been critical of Arafat, and runs a mental health program in Gaza for Palestinian children traumatized during the intifadah. The clinic, the only mental health treatment centre for children in Gaza, is funded by a $500,000 grant from Health Canada.

Axworthy went directly to Arafat to secure Sarraj's release, making it clear any more violations of Sarraj's rights would have an "impact" on Canada's review of development assistance to the Palestinian Authority. Arafat backed off.

Canada's current silence on Israeli policies should not be mistaken as a disinterest in Middle East affairs.

CJC president Hershon appeals for national unity

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

KELOWNA, B.C. — An appeal for Canadian national unity and the need of French-Canadians to feel secure about their language and culture was voiced by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) president Goldie Hershon during a recent visit here.

She said Canadians in the rest of Canada, outside of Quebec, face the challenge of recognizing the distinctiveness of French-Canadian culture "without the necessity of giving Quebec additional powers over the other provinces." She called on the federal government to "take proactive steps if Canada, as a country, is to survive another referendum."

Hershon, who was accompanied by Shellie Ettinger, of the national CJC office, came here to meet with the Okanagan Jewish Community (OJC) "and to learn more about life in a small Jewish community."

There are about 100 Jewish families in the Okanagan area. Kelowna is deep in the heart of the Rockies, about half-way between Vancouver and Calgary.

During her visit she met with Kelowna Mayor Jim Stuart; local MLAs Cindy Hawkins and John Weisbeck; and MP Werner Schmidt. Her hosts here were OJC president Mel Kotler and Robert Levin, who is on the CJC national executive.

Hershon was at the OJC centre for an afternoon program and evening dance. She called on members to get involved in Congress affairs "to prevent separatists and some individuals in the federal government from taking away from Canadians the benefit of living in the greatest country in the world."

ISRAEL AT THE OLYMPICS

Israel has been participating in the Summer Olympics since the 1952 games in Helsinki, Finland – only four years after the country was declared a state.

Israeli athletes have competed in nine Games since that time and several have placed in the top 10.

At the 1992 Games in Barcelona, Spain, Israel won its first medals. Yael Arad and Oren Smadja won the silver and bronze in their judo events.

This year, Israel has sent a delegation of 24 athletes, who will be competing in judo, wrestling, sailing, track and field and other sports. It is also the first time that Israel has sent a women's fencing team.

MUNICH

Before dawn on Sept. 6, 1972, eight Palestinian terrorists from a group called Black September climbed a fence to get into the Olympic Village in Munich, Germany, where most of the athletes at the Games were living.

They carried machine guns and hand grenades as they headed for the apartments where the Israeli athletes and coaches were sleeping. In the fight which followed, the Arabs killed two Israelis and took nine hostages.

They wanted the Israeli government to let 200 Palestinians out of jail and allow them to return to their own country. Golda Meir, who was the prime minister of Israel said no. Israel would not give in to terrorists – ever.

The German government did try to negotiate with the Palestinians, but when they tried to save the Israelis, a terrorist threw a grenade at the hostages.

In total, 11 Israelis, five terrorists and one German policeman died. It was the most horrible event at any Olympics.

Some people said the rest of the Games should be cancelled, but others said that would mean the terrorists had won. A memorial service was held the next day and then the Games continued. The other members of the Israeli team withdrew and went home to bury their teammates.

DID YOU KNOW?

• In 1988, at the Olympics in Seoul, Korea, Israel had a chance to win a medal in yachting. But the team had to settle for fourth place. They missed one race, because it was held on Yom Kippur.

• The most gold medals ever won by an athlete at a single Olympic Games were won by American swimmer Mark Spitz in Munich in 1972. Right after his last race, Spitz was sent back to the United States. He is Jewish and after the Israelis were killed, the Americans were afraid that Spitz might also be in danger.

SOME OF THE 1996 ISRAELI TEAM

Gotcha Chichiashvili is a 21-year-old wrestler. He was born in Georgia, which was a province in the former Soviet Union, and now lives in Beersheva. He wrestles in the Greco-Roman style, which is very different from the WWF wrestling that you see on TV. He won the silver medal in his division at the 1995 world championships.

Oren Smadja is 26 and lives in Ofakim. He won the bronze medal for judo in the 1992 Olympics and took the silver at the world championships last year. He has trained in Japan and South Korea.

Lydia Hatoel-Zuckerman is part of the fencing team. She is a physical education teacher in Akko. She is ranked 11th in the world in fencing's foil event.

Matas tells story of Holocaust survivor

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

We like to think that when children were freed from the concentration camps after the Holocaust, everything was wonderful for them. But that is not true. Most had a very difficult time, as they not only had to rebuild their health, but had to learn that it is safe to trust and love other people.

Carol Matas, who is well known for her earlier works on the Holocaust, Lisa, Jesper and Daniel's Story, has written a wonderful book, After the War (Scholastic Press, 1996), that tells the story of Holocaust survivor Ruth Mendenberg. Desolate after discovering that she is the only member of her family still alive, she is found by a member of Brichah, an underground group that smuggles Jews into what was then Palestine, against the wishes of the British, who controlled the country at the time.

Because she is a little older than many of the other child survivors, Ruth is made a leader of a small group that makes its way across Europe. Along the way, she finds unexpected strengths in herself and discovers that she can still laugh and that it is once again safe to care about other people.

There are some very sad parts in this book, as the children are encouraged to tell of their experiences during the war and as Ruth remembers what life used to be like. But the reader can share her joy as she and her friends finally reach Palestine and start new lives.

Kids, color in Jenn & Josh and send it to us. Write your name, address and phone number on the back. We'll put them in a hat and select three winners. Each winner will receive a cheque for $20.

Ethiopians outraged by Committee findings

By JUDY SIEGEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The Navon Committee, appointed six months ago to investigate the Ethiopian blood donation affair, has announced that there were "many shortcomings in the decision-making process" inside the Health Ministry and Magen David Adom (MDA).

But the majority of the committee members did not recommend the dismissal of anyone involved, including MDA blood services director Dr. Amnon Ben-David.

The United Ethiopian Immigrants Organization reacted with rage to the report. It was planning to hold an emergency meeting of communal leaders to demand that the government establish a state inquiry commission into all the different issues related to the aliyah and absorption of Ethiopian Jewry.

Former president Yitzhak Navon, who chaired the six-member committee, declared at a press conference at Jerusalem's Bible Lands Museum that "no racism was involved" in the official decision to discard blood donated by all Ethiopian immigrants because of the relatively high rate of HIV in the community.

"The [officials] were not evil. They worried about stigmatizing the community," Navon said, "although after the fact, we believe they should have told the immigrants the truth [when they came to donate blood]."

Instead of an across-the-board ban on accepting blood from Ethiopian immigrants, the committee recommended that blood should not be taken from anyone who, in the past 10 years (before coming to donate blood), had spent at least six months in any of 63 countries where AIDS is endemic, including southern Asia and parts of South America, the Caribbean and Africa.

In addition, blood would not be accepted from anyone who had returned during the previous 12 months from an HIV-endemic country; from hemophiliacs, homosexuals, drug addicts or prostitutes; or from anyone who had had sex during the past year with someone who is in one of the above mentioned high-risk groups.

Navon conceded the largest group that would continue to be affected is Ethiopian immigrants.

For years, the Health Ministry had appealed to the press not to disclose the high rate of HIV carriers among the immigrants.

The committee had originally included seven members: Navon; retired Tel Aviv District Court judge Eliahu Winograd; Youth Aliya social worker Natmar Hillel; Ben-Gurion University epidemiologist Prof. Lehaim Nagan; Hadassah-University Hospital hematologist Prof. Eliezer Rachmilevich; former MK Yehezkel Zakai; and (now Labor MK) Adissu Messele, chair of the immigrants' organization.

The report was presented first to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who asked the committee what could be done to prevent the spread of AIDS within the community itself.

The members urged serious educational efforts among the immigrants to cope with language and cultural problems. This could be implemented by setting up a well-financed inter-ministry team responsible to the Health Ministry.

At a second press conference in the museum after the Navon Committee's ended, Messele charged the committee "and others outside who wanted to delay the report until public interest waned" with "foot-dragging.

"We do not want to endanger public health, but all of our HIV carriers are known, unlike those in the rest of the population," Messele said. "We object to the all-encompassing ban on accepting our blood, which it is a privilege for us to donate like everyone else."

The immigrants' organization will launch a class action suit against the government and MDA for refusing to accept their blood, he added.

New approach to development in territories will raise Israelis' standard of living

By DAVID HARRIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – A new approach will be taken in developing the territories that will raise Israelis' standard of living in Judea, Samaria and Gaza, Avigdor Lieberman, director-general of the Prime Minister's Office, said last week.

Senior government officials have begun working on a program of far-reaching policy changes that will affect the entire country. Three committees of ministry directors-general met to discuss future priorities, speeding up construction work, help to northern confrontation line communities and developing the Gulf of Eilat.

While refusing to reveal detailed proposals in any of the major policy areas, Lieberman pledged to raise the standard of living, improve public services, create employment opportunities and bring industry to the settlers in Judea, Samaria and Gaza.

He pointed out a series of administrative anomalies in the territories that will be reformed. For example, he said, in 1991 a list of settlements was drawn up, with residents receiving considerable incentives to live there, but those in settlements not mentioned have not been entitled to such help.

Lieberman said there was a 40 percent construction slowdown in both the public and private sectors during the last five months of the Labor government. This has led to a considerable reduction in availability. The statistics Lieberman presented also show a reduction in work being carried out by the local, regional and national planning authorities.

The plan is to build 60,000 apartments throughout Israel, particularly in the central area, during 1997 and '98. However, the government also intends to increase the housing supply in Eilat and the south, a program that's been on hold for 10 years, Lieberman said.

The government also is promising large-scale financial help to communities along the northern confrontation line. That commitment is being made to both Jewish and Arab settlements. Four Arab villages have already been pinpointed for aid; Arrabe, Fassuta, Ghajar and Ma'ilya.

"Everything that Jewish settlements receive, they'll receive," Lieberman said. "We see ourselves as the government of everybody."

In more general terms, he said the government has every intention of improving the infrastructure in Arab areas, making particular mention of drainage and sewers.

Netanyahu tries to assuage fears

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Since his election as prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu has tried to assuage widespread fears that he will

Mideast Analysis

eviscerate the peace process, which has been in limbo since a wave of suicide bombings in Israel last winter.

Netanyahu, who was given a mandate to seek "peace with security," has repeatedly said that he is committed to peace, that he will honor the commitments of the previous Israeli government and that he intends to conduct negotiations without preconditions.

Netanyahu's declarations, however, have not really clarified matters, because he appears to reject United Nations Resolution 242, the seminal land-for-peace formula which has guided Arab-Israeli diplomacy since the Six Day War.

Although he has not openly castigated that resolution, Netanyahu has nimbly danced around it, claiming that it "is not a prerequisite for talks," and cryptically saying that he has his own interpretation of it.

Certainly, Netanyahu categorically rejects the concept of an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights, captured in 1967 and formally annexed by Israel in 1981.

Israel's bilateral negotiations with Syria, broken off last winter, were based on the premise of ceding the Golan in exchange for iron-clad security agreements and a normalization of relations.

Netanyahu unequivocably rejects this thesis, and thus places preconditions on the table that the Syrians are unlikely to accept. The government's guidlines state that the Golan is "essential to Israel's security," and that Israeli "sovereignty" over the Golan "will be the basis for an arrangement with Syria."

Believing that a peace treaty with Syria is not "achievable" at this time, Netanyahu is of the view that Israel should attempt to sign limited accords with Damascus. But if President Hafez al-Assad was unable to reach an accord with Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres on the basis of an Israeli withdrawal, what chances does Netanyahu realistically have?

The new right-wing Israeli government promises to negotiate with the Palestine Authority administered by PLO leader Yasser Arafat, on condition that "the Palestinians fulfil all their commitments fully."

But in his first speech after becoming prime minister, Netanyahu omitted any reference to the PLO, Israel's negotiating partner since 1993, and declined to say when, or if, Israel would evacuate Hebron, the last of the Arab cities on the West Bank Israel is obliged to leave under the Oslo agreements (which he supports grudgingly.)

Nor has Netanyahu deigned to meet with Arafat, who enjoyed a sound working relationship with Rabin and Peres. Intermediaries, ranging from foreign affairs advisor Dore Gold to Foreign Minister David Levy, have filled in for Netanyahu. But how long can he postpone the inevitable?

Netanyahu's approach to the Palestinians can be summed up in a word — "reciprocity." If the Palestinians respect their solemn obligations and rein in terrorism, the bane of the Oslo peace process, Israel will grant them autonomy, or as he recently put it, "a fair deal."

But Netanyahu is adamantly opposed to a Palestinian state, as well as to the division of Jerusalem, the overarching goals of the PLO. (Rabin and Peres were also against such an entity. Yet, on the eve of the May 29 election, the Labor party dropped a clause in its platform opposing a Palestinian state. As for Jerusalem, Peres put it best. Jerusalem was, he said, "religiously open but politically closed.")

Much to the anger of the Palestinians and the Arabs in general, Netanyahu intends to strengthen and broaden settlements in the territories. According to the guidelines, Israel will "allocate the resources necessary for this."

In late June, Netanyahu told U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher that he supported "the unqualified right of the Jewish people to settle anywhere in the land of Israel." Citing official statistics, Netanyahu pointed out that the Jewish population in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip had grown from 96,000 to 145,000 in the past four years, when the Labor party ran the country.

"I assume that no one (in Washington) is expecting us to do less," he said by way of preparing the Clinton administration for a renewed effort to expand settlements.

The Americans are wary of Netanyahu. In Washington, President Bill Clinton pointedly said that "the tide of history cannot be turned," while Christopher insisted that "real peace without security is not possible, and real security without peace is also impossible."

Netanyahu, who promotes himself as a pragmatist, doubtless understands that he will have to be flexible and moderate in order to widen the circle of peace in the Middle East.

But can he achieve this objective in a cabinet filled with ministers who are scornful of the Oslo accords?

U.S. sanctions against Syria will continue

By MATTHEW DORF
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON – If Syria's President Hafez al-Assad plans to make peace with the United States through his negotiations with Israel, he has a long way to go.

Members of Congress sent a clear message to Damascus this week: U.S. sanctions will continue until Syria ends its sponsorship of terrorist groups and ends its support for narcotics trafficking.

The United States "has tended to downplay [Syria's] dominance of Lebanon, its support for terrorist groups opposed to the peace process, the role of Syrian officers in drug trafficking through Lebanon and Syria's reported efforts to acquire weapons of mass destruction," said Rep. Benjamin Gilman (Republican) at the opening of a House International Relations Committee hearing last week.

The hearing, which was held despite the objections of the State Department, came less than three weeks after Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu called on the United States to step up its pressure on Syria.

The sparsely attended hearing marked an anti-climactic end to a quest by opponents of U.S. policy toward Syria to get an airing on Capitol Hill.

Almost four years ago, a Senate committee abruptly cancelled hearings on Syrian sponsorship of terrorism. At the time, a clandestine mission was underway to bring Syrian Jews to Israel.

But because all the Syrian Jews who had wanted to leave now live safely in Israel or the United States, no objections to the hearings were raised this time.

The Clinton administration feared that the hearings would antagonize Assad as State Department officials are working to find a way to jump-start talks between Israel and Syria.

The criticism of U.S. policy hinges on one central question: Has the United States been tough enough in its dealings with Assad?

Since 1979, the State Department has branded Syria a terrorist state. But in recent years, the United States has drawn the distinction between direct Syrian involvement in terrorism and support for terrorist groups.

While the government of Syria has not launched a terrorist attack since 1986 according to the State Department, Damascus continues to provide a safe haven for at least 10 Middle East terrorist groups including Hamas, Islamic Jihad and breakaway factions of the Palestine Liberation Organization opposed to the peace process.

As a nation on the U.S. lists of countries sponsoring terrorism and narcotics trafficking, Syria is banned from receiving economic assistance, weapons systems and sensitive technology. However, U.S. diplomats continue to engage the Syrian government in peace negotiations.

In the face of sharp criticism from Republicans and Democrats, State Department coordinator for counterterrorism, Philip Wilcox, defended the U.S. policy of diplomatic engagement with Syria, including Secretary of State Warren Christopher's 25 trips to Damascus during the last three years and President Clinton's two meetings with Assad.

"It is in the interest of the United States to do everything within our power to engage with Syria to persuade it to change its policies with respect to terrorism and to promote the expansion of the peace process," Wilcox said.

In challenging Wilcox, members of Congress cited reports that at the height of the April conflict between Israel and Hezbollah, Syria allowed an Iranian military jet to unload weapons at Damascus International Airport.

Christopher's plane was at a different section of the airport while he met with Syrian officials. The missiles that are used to shell Israel's northern towns were carted on Syrian military trucks to Hezbollah gunmen in Lebanon.

Rep. Eliot Engel (Democrat) went as far as calling for economic sanctions on U.S. and overseas corporations that trade with Syria. While this approach has garnered no support from the committee, Engel has sponsored a resolution that roundly condemns Syria.

The measure, with about 60 co-sponsors, called on Syria to "curb terrorism." It also signified Congress' intention to "hold the government of Syria responsible for all terrorist acts planned, trained for, financed or initiated in Syria or Lebanese territories under its occupation."

Senator Jesse Helms also flirted with the idea of proposing broad sanctions on Syria, but dropped the effort after the Clinton administration voiced considerable opposition.

Dolphins rescue tourist from shark

Jerusalem Post Staff

JERUSALEM – A British tourist who was attacked by sharks in the Gulf of Aqaba last week was saved by three dolphins, according to Israeli divers who witnessed the scene.

Martin Richardson, 29, was reported to be in stable condition in an Egyptian hospital last Thursday.

The incident occurred near Sharm el-Sheikh at the southern tip of the Sinai Peninsula. One of four British tourists aboard an Eilat-based vessel, the Jadran, Richardson had dived into the Red Sea.

The Jadran's captain, Yitzhak Hermon, said that he had stopped the boat a kilometre off the Sinai shore to permit the passengers to watch a group of dolphins cavorting nearby.

"Three people went into the water to swim with them," Hermon said. "When the two others came back, Richardson decided to stay in the water a bit.

"Suddenly we heard him scream. We thought it was a joke at first. Dolphins never attack humans. Then we saw him leap in the air and blood stained the water all around him. We understood that he was being attacked by sharks."

Dolphins leaped into the air

One of the crew sped to Richardson's aid in a rubber boat. When he reached him, he saw the injured man being circled by three dolphins, who leaped into the air, smacked the water with their tails and flippers and placed themselves between Richardson and the sharks.

Oz Goffman, director of the Israel Marine Mammal Research and Assistance Centre in Haifa, said that such behavior is known in cases where dolphins are protecting their young from sharks. However, he said, he knew of no previous instance of dolphins defending humans against sharks. He said that a dolphin could kill a shark by ramming it.

There have been reports, he said, of dolphins guiding to shore sailors whose ships had gone down, and even letting the sailors ride on their backs.

There have been only two other recorded cases of serious shark attacks in the Gulf of Aqaba in the past 50 years, Goffman said.

Suspicion points to Iran in TWA plane explosion

By URI DAN and DENNIS EISENBERG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Increasingly the finger of suspicion is being levelled at Iran for an act of terror which sent a TWA plane crashing into the sea off the coast of New York two weeks ago.

Opinion

The U.S. National Transportation Board sits tight-lipped. Reluctant to reveal embarrassing details about poor security arrangements at U.S. airports, it is stalling. Months may pass before it issues its report on the crash.

The U.S. Federation Aviation Administration (FAA), in turn, gives the impression that spending millions on costly safety devices to save lives isn't that important. In a frantic effort to pin the blame on "foreigners," the FAA has sent agents to check security at airports in Athens and Tel Aviv. We suggest they concentrate on airports in the United States.

In contrast, FBI sources openly admit that they are "actively investigating claims" that a bomb caused the TWA disaster. This follows information from Israeli and European intelligence sources, who suspect that a terrorist bomb caused that flash in the sky spotted by eyewitnesses seconds before the disaster.

Ali Fallahian, Tehran's international terror campaign chief, has reportedly trained scores of volunteers for his "human bombs." Fallahian was certainly impressed by the way suicide bombers successfully blew up U.S. and French military targets in Lebanon in 1983. He also saw how simple it was to use Hamas suicide pawns to kill over 200 bus passengers and pedestrians in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and other cities earlier this year.

Three months ago Lebanese-born Hassin Makdad lost both legs, an arm and one eye when he accidentally blew himself up in a hotel room in east Jerusalem. In hospital, begging doctors to save his life, he was so grateful at having recovered consciousness that he began to detail how Iranian instructors trained him together with an elite group of other volunteers to become a "heroic human flying bomb" for Allah.

Armed with a stolen British passport and lethal redex explosive hidden inside a simple Sony radio given him by Beirut's Iranian Embassy, he was told to board a plane to Israel via Zurich.

This choice was deliberate. The Swiss have the tightest security in Europe where Israel-bound planes are concerned. A guarded bus drives passengers to an isolated building protected by armed vehicles. They are then taken to the plane together with their luggage. Fallahian knew that if his plan succeeded in Zurich it would work anywhere.

Swiss security personnel failed to spot Makdad"s radio bomb. Nor was his false British passport in the name of Andrew Newman picked up by Israeli border control.

The terrorist revealed that his orders were to use his prepaid El Al ticket to fly out of Tel Aviv and explode the plane shortly after takeoff, just as TWA 800 blew up soon after setting off on its flight to Paris.

But Makdad was careless in priming his weapon. He wrecked part of the hotel as well as crippling himself.

An expert on aircraft security told us: "Reports that there were two explosions on TWA 800 are perfectly logical. The first small blast was a bomb. You don't need much to cripple a plane. It succeeded. The second blast was the full tanks of fuel exploding."

After travelling frequently in the United States, the expert found security there lax. It is virtually nonexistent on Paris-bound planes on the assumption that Muslim terrorists are not hostile to France.

The security aboard TWA 800 was "no better" than on the Pan Am plane that blew up over Lockerbie in 1988, killing 270 passengers and local people.

The expert said it was clear that TWA 800 wasn't blown up by a bomb designed to go off automatically at a predetermined height, as happened at Lockerbie. For that it would have had to be above 20,000 feet. Last week's explosion took place at a much lower altitude.

It is also possible that the initial explosion was a simple bomb armed with a metallic detonator which can be fitted to a key ring. When the terrorist passes through a detection gate and his keys set off the alarm, he simply hands them over with an apologetic smile. "Think about it," the security expert said. "Have you ever seen a security guard examine what's on a key ring?"

Once aboard the plane all the suicide bomber has to do is plunge the detonator into place, setting off the explosion.

There is another alternative. Any passenger can board a plane in Toronto or Oklahoma and ask for his luggage to be forwarded to his Paris-bound flight. There are no known checks on this type of luggage at U.S. airports. The theory is that if the luggage fits the passenger and the passenger fits the luggage, there is no need to check.

"Where have U.S. security chiefs been over the past few years?" the expert asked. "It doesn't seem to have registered yet that hundreds of Iranian-directed Muslim maniacs are emerging from the Middle East woodwork, only too ready to die for a cause, slobbering over the promised virgins awaiting them in paradise."

Not only did the evil mind behind the TWA bomb intend to embarrass the "Great Satan" on the eve of the Olympic Games; his action may also have been an act of revenge for the life imprisonment of Sheikh Omar Abdel-Rahman, mastermind of the bomb attacks against New York skyscrapers, and the arrest of Mousa Mohammed Abu Marzuk, a top Hamas official. Likely also on his grievance list is the jailing of Abdel-Rahman's aide, Ramzi Yousef, assassin of Rabbi Meir Kahane.

MK lashes out at Israeli society

By LEORA EREN-FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TORONTO – In his first speech to the Knesset, newly elected MK Zvi Weinberg, a former Torontonian, lashed out at Israeli society for treating immigrants with contempt.

Weinberg, a member of Israel b'Aliyah, said the sense of rejection immigrants feel in Israel is as much of a problem as housing and jobs.

"Shimon Peres was right when he said many Russian immigrants voted the way they did because they felt deeply insulted," said the former University of Toronto professor.

Weinberg, who made aliyah in 1992, after years of activity on behalf of Soviet Jewry, blamed the Israeli government, the media, academia and the army for treating immigrants with disdain. He called on the educational system to spearhead a campaign of tolerance towards immigrants from the former Soviet Union and other countries.

The 60-year-old MK attacked the Israeli press for systematically mentioning the Russian ethnic origins of suspects and criminals, calling this "a practice with no precedent in the Western press. Would an American or Canadian editor think of running a headline that read: 'A suspect of Chinese origin was arrested for robbery.' "

He cited headlines from the Israeli press referring to the " 'Russian mafia, Russian escort girls and a Russian man who killed his wife.' Is this not racism? Is this hatred of strangers not reminiscent of anti-semitism?" asked Weinberg, noting that according to police statistics, the percentage of crime among immigrants of Russian origin is no higher than that in the rest of the population.

He also cited a Hebrew University study that found that Russian intellectuals feel utterly rejected by their Israeli counterparts.

Weinberg made a special plea to religious Jews to show understanding towards Russian immigrants who have been "cut off from all Jewish tradition – through no fault of their own – for more than three generations. They are not haters of religion and tradition. They are hungry to know the history of their people, their tradition ... But it is not possible to return immediately to a life of religion and mitzvot after generations of being removed from Judaism."

It is not only Russian immigrants who encounter prejudice and ridicule in Israeli society, said Weinberg, recounting some of the experiences that he and his family underwent as new immigrants from Canada.

When Weinberg gave up his Canadian and American citizenship in order to swear allegiance to the Knesset, the MK recalls that "there were those who told me I would regret this act."

When his two sons volunteered in the army, they were ridiculed by their commanders, he said.

Weinberg called on the educational system to address the way Israelis relate to olim. He noted that in recent years the system has been providing education for peace and democracy and striving to break down stereotypes of Arabs.

"Now the time has come to turn such efforts towards the olim living here," said Weinberg, urging tolerance and open-mindedness towards immigrants.

England's Rabbi Jakobovits advocates division of Jerusalem

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Former British chief rabbi Lord Immanuel Jakobovits last week accused Israelis of living in "cloud-cuckoo-land" and advocated a functional division of Jerusalem, "if it were to lead to a genuine peace.

"Let the Palestinians fly their flag in the parts which they already occupy," he told the Sunday Telegraph.

"It wouldn't mean shifting a single person from one area to another. There would be a relationship between the two authorities, but they would have their own mayor.

"Giving freedom to people and recognizing their national aspirations is a Jewish ideal."

Rabbi Jakobovits also supported returning the Golan Heights to Syria. "Just as I can see no reason why there cannot be a Palestinian enclave within Jerusalem, if it were to lead to a genuine peace, I see no reason why there should not be autonomous Jewish settlements in the Golan Heights under Syrian sovereignty."

Sky's the limit for Toronto singer/songwriter

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A month after singer/songwriter Amy Sky, launched her first CD Cool Rain, her music career sky-rocketed into a different orbit.

Sky, 35, who is from Toronto, was to start a mid-May promotional tour when she got a call from Michael Burgess, the co-star of the hit British musical Blood Brothers, now playing at the Royal Alexandra Theatre.

Burgess told Sky he had recommended her for the female lead of the Toronto production and after listening to her CD, the show's producers wanted her to audition.

Although she had no professional acting experience, Sky won the part of Mrs. Johnstone and started her new career as a dramatic musical actor with two intensive weeks of rehearsal in London. She's been garnering rave reviews since the show's opening on May 30.

She acknowledges the implausibility of her stage success. "This is the kind of thing you see in a movie. Nobody walks into a leading role of a major international stage production with no or very little acting experience," she said.

She did some acting in college and high school productions and she "heavily subsidized" her college education with dinner theatre, playing a "Cockney wench" at the now defunct Her Majesty's Feast, she said.

Listening to a cassette of the show's music on the plane, Sky noted that the alto part was perfectly suited to her vocal range.

"It was written for me. The music is much more folk-influenced than it is Broadway, and so is my own music. Musically I felt confident."

And musical ability is the key, because Mrs. Johnstone is usually played "by a pop singer who also acts rather than an actress who also sings," Sky said. "I won the audition on the basis of my CD."

Pop stars Carol King, Petula Clark and Helen Reddy have played the role. Reddy was slated to come to Toronto, Sky said, but "three weeks before preview night they realized she wasn't available."

Sky prepared for the show by "working my tail off" in rehearsal, she said. "By opening night I knew I had it. I was worried that I might forget my lines. David Cassidy said to me, "Just go out and have fun. If you forget your lines I'll cover for you. We'll all cover for you'."

She wasn't nervous on opening night, she said. "I was full of adrenalin."

Sky's stage work is one aspect of a multi-faceted career which includes song writing. She's on contract with Warner Chappell Music to write 20 songs a year and perform and record. She also co-produces television music specials with her husband, singer/songwriter Marc Jordan.

Sky's career spans 13 years, 10 of which were spent in the United States. Her songs have been recorded by such stars as Melissa Manchester, Olivia Newton John, Diana Ross and Reba McEntire.

After writing songs for other recording artists, Sky said having her own CD is a "dream come true."

A single from the CD, Don't Leave Me Alone made it to number 8 on the Canadian charts in May and another single, I Will Take Care of You is in the top 20 and rising. Sales have been spurred by the publicity from Blood Brothers, she said.

Many people may view her last minute audition and subsequent stage success as a Cinderella story, Sky said. " 'Overnight success' of course that comes after 13 years."

Domim's prequel starts open run in Toronto

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – It played only two weeks in New York and three weeks in Los Angeles, so Hussain Amarshi, owner of the Toronto-based film distribution company Mongrel Media, says he is "very pleasantly surprised" that the Israeli film Under the Domim Tree has lasted at Toronto's Carlton Cinema for at least nine weeks.

The long run of Under the Domim Tree has persuaded Amarshi to import the film's prequel, The Summer of Aviyah (1988), which began an open run at the Carlton Cinema last weekend.

"It would be my dream-wish to see both films playing simultaneously," he said, adding that it might happen if Under the Domim Tree continues to draw an audience that no previous general-run Israeli film has been able to attract here.

"Its success also reflects the effects of organizations like the Toronto Jewish Film Society and the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, which have nurtured a public for such films."

Like Under the Domim Tree, The Summer of Aviyah was directed by Eli Cohen and stars Kaipo Cohen as Aviyah and Gila Almagor, Israel's first lady of the cinema, as Aviyah's mother Henya. The film chronicles a summer in the life of 10-year-old Aviyah as she yearns for knowledge of her father, who evidently died before she was born.

As the summer progresses, Henya, who had been a partisan fighter in the forests of Poland during the Holocaust, descends increasingly into madness. Invariably, the inner conflicts of mother and daughter affect others detrimentally in the tight-knit village in which they live.

The film was based on Almagor's semi-autobiographical book of the same name, which was published in 1987 and has since been translated into 10 languages. In 1992, she published a second book, Under the Domim Tree, a further chronicle of her alter-ego Aviya, again to wide acclaim. Besides acting in both film adaptations, Almagor co-produced them and wrote both screenplays.

"We are really thrilled at the success of Under the Domim Tree, and we're obviously delighted that Israeli films are penetrating the Canadian market," said Alise Siegel, cultural affairs representative for the Consulate General of Israel in Toronto.

Golden Bridges links different cultures

TORONTO — An interest in other cultures led Daneal Charney to establish Golden Bridges, a consulting firm which helps businesses adapt to different cultures.

The service is useful for businesses that are involved with international clients or have marketing programs which target specific groups, and for companies with multicultural work forces, she said.

The South African born Charney, 27, who moved to Canada with her family in 1980, had been interested in other people since she was a teenager, she said.

After graduating from Waterloo University with a degree in political science and international relations in 1992, Charney was accepted by World Teach, a U.S.-based non-profit organization associated with Harvard University School of Business and was sent to teach English in China.

Charney was fascinated with the culture and extended her planned two-month stay in Shanghai for an additional six months. On her

Contra The Heard offers non-trendy stock advice

By JOSEPH SERGE
TAB news editor

TORONTO – Are you thinking of investing in the stock market, but don't want to pay a broker high commissions or get expensive advice?

Benj Gallander and Ben Stadelmann, founders of Gal-Stad Investments Inc., have been investing in the stock market for almost 20 years. Over the past five years, their annualized return was over 25 percent. Now, with Contra The Heard, they want you to benefit from their experience and research.

"Contra The Heard is an investment letter that focuses on stocks on the New York and Toronto stock exchanges," said Gallander, author of the best-seller The Canadian Small Business Survival Guide. "The idea behind it is for investors to achieve a high investment return – to make money."

The quarterly newsletter provides stock news, trends, what to watch for, what stocks they've recently bought and sold and performance results of the stocks they currently own.

The name itself, Contra The Heard, is a statement of its basic principle. " 'Contra' is contrary, meaning what is unpopular is more popular for us," Gallander said.

" 'Heard' is a play on the words 'herd' and 'heard' – what the herd hears on the stock market. We do not concentrate on trendy stocks. We concentrate on turnaround situations and stocks currently unpopular but likely to regain lustre in the near future."

Knowing which stocks are going to turn around requires patience and meticulous examination of the corporations involved. Sometimes a stock is studied for up to five years before a purchase decision is made.

"Initally we look at all the stocks on both exchanges to see which are near their 52-week low. Then we check to see which of them are leaning towards their 10-year-low," Gallander said.

"For these stocks, we get financial reports for the past two years. We gather information on the companies for a minimum of six months before we even look at a buying decision."

In addition to profit potential, Gal-Stad examines a company's growth potential, book value, price-earnings and more.

If they decide not to purchase the stock, they still continue to follow it.

"We concentrate on financial ratios that indicate turnarounds are possible. Changes in managment are carefully noticed. We buy most of our stock three to five years after we find them. During this time period we look for improvements in the company's financial situation."

One of the 14 points in the company's statement of philosophy is to invest only in organizations which have existed for at least 10 years, mainly to ensure that the stock has a history. "A lot of new issues are stocks which quickly plummet. We want to make sure there's an upside potential."

Gal-Stad Investments purchases every stock it recommends, thereby putting its money where its mouth it. "If our subscribers invest the same way we do, then their results should parallel ours," Gallander said.

Contra The Heard is limiting its subscriber base to 1,000. "Because we provide incisive advice, our subscription rate is higher than other investment letters ($50 for an introductory issue), but by limiting our circualtion we can provide optimal service.

"For example our subscribers can call us for up-to-date information. We tell them when to buy and when to sell. With a large subscription base we couldn't serve our clients as efficiently."

One stock Gal-Stad recently bought into on the Toronto market is Cineplex. When purchased in April, Cineplex shares were $1.77. Now they're $2.60. Gallander has set a target rate to sell at $3.85.

"Cineplex has reduced its debt and increased its cash flow. These are two of the most important things to look for."

$100 Bonds program links children to Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Rabbi Wayne Allen, spiritual leader of Beth Tikvah Synagogue, and Rabbi Steven Saltzman of Adath Israel Congregation are the co-chairs of State of Israel Bonds $100 certificate program.

The program, established as part of the Reach Out campaign co-chaired by David Markowitz and Henry Morton, encourages the purchase of $100 (US) certificates to commemorate bar or bat mitzvahs, weddings or any other special occasion.

The non-interest bearing certificates are redeemable in five years or can be cashed in Israel for shekels after one year. As well, they can be used towards an El Al flight after one year, or can be converted to an Israel Bond.

"What a better way to rejoice in a simchah," says Rabbi Allen. "We recognize the mitzvah with a meaningful gift and we show our commitment to Israel. There is no better way to perform a mitzvah than to support Israel."

"The campaign aims at increasing awareness of State of Israel Bonds in the community, especially reaching out to teenage children and their parents," says Markowitz. "It is so important to link our children with Israel, to give them a sense of partnership and to make sense of our relationship with Israel."

Rabbi Saltzman stresses that purchasers are not giving to charity when they buy these certificates. "It is of paramount importance that Jews have a feeling of ownership to the State of Israel. When you purchase a $100 certificate you are making a personal investment in Israel. It is an instrument of supporting Israel, which is an essential part of the Jewish people. The certificate allows you to give the gift of Israel and sanctify the simcha, to make a commitment to Israel and to encourage others to make the connection.," he says.

return to Canada, she decided to combine the professional training she had been given in her father's management consultant firm with her adaptability and love of other cultures.

Charney began her cross-cultural consulting career as an employee of the non-profit Toronto-based Foundation for International Training where she facilitated relationships between Canadian and Chinese businesspeople. She was responsible for introducing delegations to different Canadian companies.

She said she noticed that business practices across cultures differed significantly. "I saw how problematic it was when people didn't understand each other's cultures. There is a lot of miscommunication and misunderstanding."

She zeroed in on this niche and set up Golden Bridges (905-886-5605) in 1995. One of the services she offers is educating Canadian businesspeople about the impact of culture on business practices and helping them build adaptive communication skills.

For example, to negotiate with Chinese businesspeople you need to keep in mind that the Chinese communicate indirectly, Charney explained. "They don't say no directly even though that's the intent. There are other ways of saying no, like 'we'll see what we can do.' "

Westerners need to learn to decode non-verbal signals, she said, in order to understand the significance of issues such as the status of the negotiators and the venue of meetings.

Yiddishland Cafe pays tribute to Jewish poet Itsik Manger

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Itsik Manger, the Golden Peacock of Yiddish literature, who died a destitute alcoholic in Israel in 1969, has proven to be a link to Jewish continuity in Toronto.

A sold-out crowd of 200 filled all the tables when the Yiddishland Cafe recently played host to entertainers who sang and read Manger's work.

As at its first sold-out evening, the Yiddishland Cafe attracted a significant number of young people, this time to hear the words of a gentle poet who wrote for ordinary Jews, not the elite.

It was in this same Workmen's Circle hall on Lawrence Avenue West that Manger gave a lecture on Yiddish literature in the late 1950s attended by cafe chair Henia Reinhartz and her 8-year-old daughter Adele, now associate dean of graduate studies at McMaster University.

Born in Romania in 1901, Manger became a well known poet in pre-war Poland and fled to England before the Nazis took over. In England, according to Reinhartz, Manger was penniless and felt completely abandoned.

It was not until near the end of his days that Manger established his reputation in Israel with the production in Yiddish of the Megillah Lieder. A fantastic array of characters people this satire of the famous Purim story and it is the basis of a new Broadway play, I am Itsik Manger by Avi Hoffman of Too Jewish? fame.

The talents of folk singer Batsheva, actress and CBC producer Thaya Thalenberg and musicians Martin Van de Ven and Sasha Luminsky illuminated the paens to nature which Manger wove in his poetry. Nor did Batsheva and Thalenberg miss any opportunity to include his pot shots at the elite.

The Yiddishland Cafe, which holds its next meeting Sept. 7, is supported in part by a grant from the continuity program of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Manifest Communications

Marketing firm promotes social causes not products

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There are probably few adult Canadians who don't remember the Participaction ad campaign, a countrywide blitz which began in 1974 and became the cornerstone for a national fitness movement.

But for 48-year-old Mark Sarner, president of Manifest Communications, the campaign was his springboard to a new career in social marketing, a field first named in 1971 and one which he has helped pioneer in Canada.

In 1974, with a background in journalism and two years' experience producing films, Sarner and a partner were asked to write a script about fitness.

"The client turned out to be Participaction, and based on the film script, we were invited to write an ad campaign," recalled Sarner in a recent interview. "That led to 14 years of work on helping create the fitness movement in Canada, and at the same time we began to work on other social issue areas. We discovered we had an affinity for this work and, it seemed, a talent."

The 22 awards hanging neatly on a reception area wall, along with two not yet hung, attest to his words.

Further testimony — in the form of posters, ads and informational campaigns — fills much of the wall space at Manifest's 11,500-square-foot office, located on the third floor of a nondescript building in the heart of Toronto's trendy fashion district.

Sarner and two partners, one of whom had co-written the original Participation script, founded Manifest in 1981. The company has since grown from a three-person enterprise to an established agency with 23 full-time staff.

"Cause marketing"

The services offered by Manifest — including market research, planning strategy, creative development and execution — do not differ substantively from those of "conventional" agencies, explained Sarner. The difference lies in their adaptation to issues and causes such as employment equity, the environment, charitable giving and race relations, rather than to goods and services.

Making the world a better place through marketing is all in a day's work for Mark Sarner, seen next to a current bus shelter poster. [Barry Shainbaum photo]

For Manifest's business clients — who have twigged only in recent years to the benefits of social marketing, an area of expertise originally geared to the non-profit sector — the bottom line issue-wise is often intertwined with the bottom line financially. "Consumers are making active purchase and boycott decisions based on how a company behaves," said Sarner.

Employee morale is also a consideration, according to Sarner. "The best and brightest people ... want to work for socially responsible companies. [Doing good] can have a big impact on motivating and keeping employees."

"Cause marketing" has increased significantly in Canada in recent years. In the United States, social marketing is estimated to be a multi-billion dollar industry.

Clients of Manifest can expect to pay anywhere from a few thousand dollars for ad hoc consulting to hundreds of thousands of dollars per year for complete program design and implementation.

To fill a growing need — as evidenced by enrolment of over 200 people in Manifest's social marketing conferences and by the fact that Social Marketing for Business is now taught at York University's Schulich School of Business — Sarner and Janice Nathanson, Manifest's vice-president and marketing director, recently published Social Marketing for Business: What to know. What to do, a 102-page book which breaks the subject down into manageable components. To the best of Sarner's knowledge, it's the first book about social marketing for business.

Despite, or perhaps because of, the relative newness of the field, there's no lack of opportunity for companies to become involved in social change. According to one report, Chrysler Canada alone is getting about 2,000 formal requests for donations per year, said Sarner.

But corporate philanthropy is not what it used to be. "In days gone by, corporations would write cheques in response to requests from various organizations. Now they want to have active participation in making change. They're investing as opposed to 'expensing.' "

In addition to corporate clients such as Coca-Cola and Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada, Manifest has served a wide range of government, non-profit and professional organizations, among them the Addiction Research Foundation, Canadian Diabetes Association, Canadian Dental Association, Health Canada, the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation, the Ontario Ministry of Agriculture and Food and United Jewish Appeal.

"Virtually everything we work on in one way or another is a tough sell," mused Sarner.

Changing attitudes

"When you're talking about changing attitudes, behaviors, social norms, you're talking about a tough sell. You have to expect that major attitude change and behavioral change will easily consume three to five years before you move the needle in a significant way. Awareness can often be done faster, but that's only one step. Social change is a very challenging exercise."

Sarner says that Manifest can help clients "right from square one" if they don't have a focus or a social cause, but he cautions that social marketing "is not intended to obfuscate or mitigate problematic social behavior. The moral aspects are very important."

For Sarner, his work is an ongoing source of satisfaction. "I have the opportunity to contribute to addressing the major social issues of our time. I find it exciting and challenging to apply myself to making the world a better place, and I find it interesting to do that as a business."

On a personal level, he sometimes finds himself in the dual role of marketing expert and average consumer. A public awareness campaign for the Canadian Dental Association was a case in point. "I had no idea," said Sarner. "I thought 'no cavities' meant 'no problems.' I was quite surprised to learn that, as an adult, gum disease is the issue. I've had fundamental misconceptions about my dental health and reasons to go to the dentist."

Obeying the 10 Commandments of Tropical Travel

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There's nothing like illness to put a damper on a trip, especially when the cause is some exotic creepy-crawly or flying insect. So why would anyone want to travel in the Third World anyway?

Dr. Jay Keystone, director of the tropical disease unit at The Toronto Hospital, asked and answered the above question during a fast-paced, information- and wisecrack-filled talk on The Ten Commandments of Tropical Travel, following a recent national/Toronto board meeting of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science.

"The scenery is absolutely beautiful ... the culture is amazing ... most of all are the people, especially the children ... We have material wealth. They have a spiritual wealth," he said.

Although he recently completed a countrywide educational program for family doctors, he recommends contacting the International Association for Medical Assistance to Travellers (IAMAT) or visiting a travel clinic for "the most up-to-date, accurate advice," particularly when planning an extended trip.

Dr. Jay Keystone

He stressed that travellers should be immunized according to risk. Both destination and planned activities affect the risk factor.

Protecting oneself from insects is another of Keystone's "commandments." He is a proponent of the controversial insect repellent DEET, especially in light of increasing drug resistance to malaria. DEET protects against all insects except stingers, although he cautions that it should be used sparingly and only on exposed skin.

Those who prefer Avon's Skin So Soft, which does not contain DEET, must reapply it hourly to maintain its effectiveness, he said. (In contrast, DEET is effective for four to 10 hours, depending on its concentration.)

Not all of Keystone's commandments involve medical or chemical preparations. He mentioned bednets to keep insects away, and emphasized the importance of sun protection with hats and protective clothing as well as sunscreen. By the year 2000, one in 100 Canadians will die of skin cancer, he said.

Footwear can be another health protector, noted Keystone. A particularly unappealing but treatable condition caused by worm larvae migrating under the skin — when a person is walking barefoot, for example — can be prevented.

Most travellers know the basic food precautions — as Keystone sums it up, "Boil it! Peel it! Cook it! Or forget it!"

By following that advice, travellers can ward off, among other things, parasites that produce amoebic liver abcesses, a process currently being studied by Weizmann scientists. Other Weizmann staff are working on a vaccine against a different type of parasite.

TAU team discovers new genetic disease

By JUDY SIEGEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

TEL AVIV – Tel Aviv University scientists have discovered a rare new genetic disease, and identified the defective gene that causes it. Named TA-24 in honor of the university, the disease, which makes patients extremely sensitive to sunlight, has been recognized by the scientific community.

Prof. Hanoch Slor, of the Sackler School of Medicine's Human Genetics Department, headed a team that discovered the disorder, which involves faulty ability to repair the DNA in the genes.

For several years, Slor's team conducted research on a related disease, xeroderma pigmentosum (XP), in which patients are extremely sensitive to ultraviolet light. It causes the irreversible appearance of pigments in the skin and skin growths. Discovered in 1968, XP involves the inability of the body to repair damage to the DNA in all the cell's genes. It can be detected during the early stages of pregnancy.

Since most chemotherapy drugs used for treating cancer work by linkage with the DNA and preventing the cell from dividing, XP patients are 1,000 times as sensitive to UV rays and to chemotherapy drugs. Chemotherapy can cause them serious harm and even kill them. Since XP patients suffer from tumors, doctors must be very careful not to give them chemotherapy drugs that act like UV light on their DNA.

For the past 14 years, Slor and his colleagues have been treating a teen who is hypersensitive to UV light.

He was suspected of being a member of one of the 30 Israeli families suffering from XP. Like an XP patient, a few minutes of exposure during midday caused serious burns but very little pigmentation characteristic of XP was produced.

Using a technique developed in England to test DNA repair, they found that his general DNA repair was normal, but that only specific ("active") genes were unable to repair their DNA.

Atlanta Jews memorialize slain Israeli athletes

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In what is being seen as an unprecedented development, two members of the International Olympic Committee (IOC) attended a memorial service in Atlanta for the 11 Israeli athletes killed by terrorists at the 1972 Munich games.

The memorial service was held last Sunday — only days after two people were killed and hundreds wounded by a bomb blast in Atlanta — by the Jewish Federation of Atlanta in cooperation with Israel's Consulate-General. It was one of three memorial events organized by the Atlanta Jewish community during the Olympics to honor the slain Israeli athletes.

In addition to the federation-sponsored event, two memorial services were conducted by Atlanta synagogues.

Since 1972, the IOC has refused to memorialize the Israeli athletes at subsequent games, claiming it did not want to mix sport and politics. Though IOC members had been invited to the federation memorial, at first they did not agree to attend. But a barrage of publicity, including a news conference attended by media from 17 countries, coverage by major U.S. networks, including CNN, as well meetings by the families of the slain athletes with former U.S. President Jimmy Carter and former UN ambassador Andrew Young appears to have shamed the IOC into attending.

Kim Un Yong, first vice-president of the IOC, and Alex Gilady, an IOC member from Israel, attended the federation memorial as did a representative of the Palestinian Olympic delegation.

During the program, the Palestinian delegate in an impromptu gesture approached one of the Israeli orphans and kissed her on the forehead.

The program in memory of the athletes included addresses from Bill Campbell, the mayor of Atlanta and from Billy Payne, president of the Atlanta Committee for the Olympic Games. A permanent memorial statue was also unveiled and speakers referred to last week's bombing in Atlanta when discussing the events of 1972.

In addition, Ankie Spitzer-Rekhess, widow of a slain athlete, addressed the memorial. The event was attended by most of the remaining family members of the slain athletes: Yael Gutfreund, Ilana Romano, Oshrat Romano, Rachel Romano, Shlomit Romano, Eyal Shapira, Oz Shapira, Shay Shapira, Shirly Shapira, Michal Shor, Anouk Spitzer, Alex Springer, Eugenia Springer, Mimi Weinberg and Guri Weinberg.

The Israeli team to the Atlanta games also attended.

Earlier, the 2,000-family Ahavath Achim Congregation, the largest Conservative shul in the south, honored the fallen athletes with a memorial during Shabbat services. Israeli Consul-General Arye Mekel addressed the congregation as did some of the children of the athletes, said Jerre Ashkenazi, the shul's executive-director.

Another memorial service a week later was held at The Temple, a Reform congregation. The Temple was the target of a 1958 bombing by the Ku Klux Klan.

Cheryl Coco, a spokeswoman for the Israeli consulate-general, said the families of the slain athletes have left no stone unturned in their bid to get some acknowledgement by the IOC that their family members had been killed.

Federation spokeswoman Lynne Tobins said, "The children and widows have been extremely outspoken. They say that in Barcelona, they were promised something would be done for the centennial games (in Atlanta) and now they're frustrated."

The families have lobbied for years for some sort of recognition from the IOC for their loss. The IOC has steadfastly refused to honor the victims with even a moment's silence.

Families' worst nightmare came true

Special to The CJN

ATLANTA — Shay Shapira remembers the day in 1972 when his father, track coach Amitzur Shapira, left their home in Israel for the Olympic Games in Munich, West Germany.

The five-year-old Shay peered out the balcony as his father entered a car driven by the young boy's grandfather. Only a few days later, Shay and his family were gripped with fear.

Amitzur and 10 teammates were taken hostage by Palestinian terrorists. Soon, their worst nightmare became reality: Amitzur and the other Israelis were murdered after a failed rescue attempt by German police.

Twenty-four years later, the anguished emotions of that time have not diminished.

"We speak about him every day," said Shapira, now 28.

His sister, Shirly, 24, was six months old when their father was killed. The siblings and two other brothers constantly look at pictures and study videotapes of the late coach, Shay Shapira said.

"We try to remember him all the time," he said.

To do so, Shay and Shirly flew to Atlanta with the 12 other Israelis who lost fathers and husbands in the attack. The Israeli Olympic Committee (IOC) footed the bills for their flights and for tickets to the opening ceremonies.

The group's goal was to persuade the IOC to recognize the tragedy and to educate the world about its loss.

Dutch-born Ankie Spitzer-Rekhess is the only one of the widows to have remarried. She stressed that the families are not asking for a memorial to the slain athletes for political reasons.

"We don't ask that they mention the 11 Israelis or 11 Jews. We just ask that they mention the 11 athletes who came to participate in the international games with a spirit of peace and brotherhood and went home in coffins."

In addition to ignoring the massacre in official literature, the IOC denied the families' request that their 14 children be invited to participate in the opening ceremony at the Atlanta games.

"The IOC already said they are not going to do it because it is a political act, Spitzer-Rekhess said, "[The IOC] are afraid the Arab delegations will get up and walk out if they try to have a memorial service."

During the opening ceremonies, several relatives of the slain athletes left the stadium in tears. IOC President Juan Antonio Samaranch spoke about the suffering of Sarajevo's citizens, but remained silent about the 1972 tragedy.

In an interview, the Israelis said they were not upset with the presence at the Olympics of a "Palestine" team. Rather, they said, they simply want their fathers to be remembered.

"Our fathers came [to the Olympics] in peace and they came back [to Israel] in coffins," said Judith Gutfreund Salman, daughter of the late Yosef Gutfreund, a wrestling referee.

For Alex Springer, one of the more vocal members of the group, the mission is clear. He said to remind the world of the devastation of terrorism the IOC should include not just one moment of silence but a memorial during every Olympics.

"Once is not enough," said Springer, son of the late weightlifting referee Ya'acov Springer. "If we forget, nobody will remember."

"He was very kind and open to hearing our story," said Yael Gutfreund Shaman, Salman's sister. He listened to their account of the attack and their thoughts on the IOC, she said.

Asked by Carter about their attitudes towards the Palestinian athletes at the games, Shay Shapira said, "We should be their enemies only in sports. They're our neighbors and we have to continue to live with them."

For Eugenia Springer Mayo, Alex Springer's sister, remembering Munich means preventing future tragedy. "We don't want anybody to be as hurt as we. We hope we are the last."

Judokas fall short

Special to The CJN

ATLANTA — Israel's two top medal hopefuls came up short last week in Olympic judo competition.

Yael Arad, winner of a silver medal in Barcelona, and Oren Smadja, winner of a bronze, both failed to advance to the medal rounds.

Suffering from a virus and at only 70 per cent of her potential, Arad was forced into a consolation group where she lost her match.

Smadja suffered torn knee ligaments only two weeks before the Olympics but ignored doctors advice to pass up the games. Instead, he dragged his leg onto the mat and tried to hide the pain he was suffering.

In other results, swimmer Dan Kutler broke his own Israeli record by finishing a 100-metre butterfly heat in 55.11 seconds but that was only good for a 31st place finish, 2.22 seconds behind Australia's Scott Miller, who set an Olympic record.

Vadim Alekseyev finished 27th in the 200-m breaststroke, 6.58 seconds off the pace of Hungary's Karoly Guttler. Alekseyev reached the 200-m finals at the 1988 Seoul Olympics while competing for the Soviet Union.

In other results, Ran Shental and Nir Shental were in 14th place after two races in the men's 470 yachting competition while Anat Fabrikant and Shany Kedmy were ninth through seven races in the women's 470 event.

The Inside Back

About Life

Dear Ella,

My sister and I have always been very close. Whenever there is a problem, we can count on each other to help out.

There is one thing that I am annoyed with and don't really want to be a part of. You see, Stephanie, my sister, has many friends that go back to when she was in junior high. Over the years they have become very close. They are all of the "marrying age" now, and Stephanie is making many bridal showers.

I know all of her friends and they are very nice people, but she keeps inviting me to all of these bridal showers. She says she needs the support and possibly some help if she gets too overwhelmed between the organizing, the guests, the food and the cleaning.

I work full time and do not want to spend my weekends at a bridal shower. I also don't want to buy gifts.

Is this being petty? I think if the tables were turned she would be there for me.

To Shower or Not

Dear To Shower or Not,

I understand the bond between two sisters can be strong, but you are entitled to a separate life as well.

You say you are always there to help each other out, however this is not the kind of major crisis where you "have to be there" for your sister. There is nothing you can do at that shower that a waitress couldn't do. If your sister hired a waitress, the shower would cost just a little more, she would feel comfortable and be able to have a good time too. You could enjoy your weekends and stop buying gifts.

I think the key here is to speak up. I'm not sure Stephanie realizes that she is imposing on you. She is probably caught up in the making of the showers and just assumes that you will be at her side. She may even feel if she doesn't invite you, you will be offended.

If you are as close as you say, Stephanie will not expect you to do something that is so annoying to you.

The key here is to talk. The sooner you let her know how you are feeling, the sooner you can get on enjoying your weekends.

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN. But Ella is not a professional counsellor. She brings to the questions posed by readers her unique brand of earthy wisdom. Her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

CHICKEN THIGHS WITH ORANGE SAUCE

2-3 lbs. chicken thighs or drumsticks	1 tblsp cornstarch
1/2 tsp paprika	1/2 tsp ground ginger
1 med. onion, sliced	2 tblsp chopped fresh parsley
3/4 cup orange juice	salt
2 tblsp brown sugar	pepper

Place chicken thighs in 9x13" (3L) glass baking dish. Sprinkle with paprika and arrange onion slices over chicken. In a small bowl combine orange juice, brown sugar, cornstarch, ginger and parsley; mix well. Pour sauce evenly over; cover and bake in a 350°F oven 1 hr, basting twice or until thighs are tender and juices run clear when tested with a knife. Season with salt and pepper to taste.

Preparation time: 10 mins. Makes 4 servings. A tangy, slightly sweet sauce is the flavour accent. Serve this dish with a crisp green salad.

Diplomatically Speaking

By JEHUDI KINAR

This is the first in a series of monthly columns from the Consulate General of Israel in Toronto. This month, we offer a cultural update of some of the events we have helped sponsor or organize.

Israel is experiencing a cultural growth, some of which is extending across borders and reaching Canada, as a new era of general prosperity in Israel has enabled greater resources to be diverted to the arts.

As a country of immigrants, Israel's cultural identity is defined by a wide array of international influences — both Eastern and Western. The cultural diversity expressed in our art is a reflection of the ever-growing heterogeneity of our society. There is, at the same time, a thriving indigenous culture which continues to reach new heights as the country produces home-grown art and artists born and raised in Israel, shaped by its history, expressing current concerns and experiences.

Literary figures such as Amos Oz, A. B. Yehoshua, Aharon Appelfeld, Yehuda Amichai and David Grossman are just a few of the Israeli authors who have received tremendous international recognition. There are similar lists in the fields of music, visual arts, dance and theatre. Indeed, Israeli culture is gaining significant international prominence in all spheres.

Much of this new and rejuvenated art has succeeded in penetrating the Canadian market. In the past year, Toronto has been host to a number of exciting events, among them some contemporary Israeli singers/musicians, including David Broza and Achinoam (NOA) Nini; the Kibbutz Artzi Choir performances in Toronto and London; an Israeli film festival organized by Cinematheque Ontario, which highlighted the films of Israeli actress, Gila Almagor (who was in Toronto for the occasion); and most recently, the commercial release, by Mongrel Media, of Under the Domim Tree and Summer of Aviya at the Carlton Cinemas.

These two films are currently playing side by side in separate theatres at the Carlton — a milestone for Israeli film in Canada. Plans are already underway to release the films in Edmonton, Calgary, Vancouver, Montreal and Ottawa.

The consulate is making a concerted attempt to bring Israeli culture to other cities throughout Canada. Israeli singer Ronit Ophir performed in Vancouver this year in honor of Yom Ha'atzmaut. In the fall, we plan to have a musical recital featuring two talented young Israeli artists. Violinist Vadim Gluzman and pianist Angela Yoffe will make their Canadain debut together in Edmonton, Calgary and Toronto.

A wonderful ceramics exhibit at the Waterloo Clay and Glass Museum marked the beginning of a campaign for the establishment of a Chair in Jewish Studies at the University of Waterloo.

This summer, an exhibit entitled Jerusalem From the Air will be displayed at the Folkorama Festival in Winnipeg. In the fall, an archeological exhibit will be on display at McMaster University in Hamilton, entitled From the Diaspora to Jerusalem: Newly Discovered Family Tombs in the Kidron Valley.

Many of these events are taking place in conjunction with Jerusalem 3000 festivities. Jerusalem is reverberating with the sights and sounds of the Jerusalem Film Festival, numerous symphonies, a gospel music festival and the International Arts and Crafts Fair.

The Jerusalem 3000 events will continue throughout January 1997. While we pay tribute to this momentous occasion in Canada, exciting events are taking place around the world, especially in Jerusalem.

We have two very important landmark years in the offing. In 1997, we will celebrate 100 years since the formal establishment of Zionism as a movement at the first Zionist Congress in Basel, Switzerland. In 1988, we will mark 50 years since the establishment of the State of Israel. We will certainly join together in many cultural celebrations to mark these events. Now more than ever we recall the words of Theodore Herzl, "If you will it, it is no dream."

Hussein a peace go-between

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu secretly met Jordan's King Hussein in Britain two weekends ago, senior government officials confirmed last week.

King Hussein was also to visit Syria for the first time since he signed the peace treaty with Israel and meet President Hafez al-Assad.

The meeting between Netanyahu and King Hussein was kept quiet, so that King Hussein would be publicly seen as having met with Assad before he met Netanyahu, who was also scheduled to visit King Hussein in Amman. Apparently it was important to Netanyahu to meet King Hussein before the latter met Assad. There is speculation the two discussed ideas surrounding Netanyahu's "Lebanon first" initiative.

Netanyahu first spoke on the phone with British Prime Minister John Major for 25 minutes, probably to notify him before visiting Britain.

The Jerusalem Post disclosed that Netanyahu had slipped out of the country with top aides two weeks ago. Dore Gold, Netanyahu's foreign policy adviser, left last week for talks with Secretary of State Warren Christopher and U.S. peace process coordinator Dennis Ross in a bid to further advance the prospects on the Syrian track, particularly for a "Lebanon first" approach.

Please see Editorial page 8

Gold held advance talks in Amman last week with Crown Prince Hassan to plan the meeting between Netanyahu and King Hussein, where bilateral issues will be discussed.

Sources in the Prime Minister's Office noted that Netanyahu is an advocate of bolstering ties with Jordan, and favors upgrading the U.S.-Jordanian relationship. Among the ideas favored by Jerusalem are the establishment of a U.S.-Jordan free trade zone and bolstering security assistance.

Meanwhile, both Syria and Netanyahu's office denied reports that Assad dispatched an envoy to Israel early this month to explore peace prospects. Sources said Damascus is vehemently opposed to secret talks, favoring instead the utilization of the United States as a mediator and believing only Washington is capable of pressuring Jerusalem.

It is known, however, that an American citizen with strong Syrian connections met an official in the Prime Minister's Office in mid-June during a private visit. He then went to Damascus, where he apparently met with senior Syrian officials.

This same man has visited Israel several times in the past and met frequently with Yitzhak Rabin.

SEALING A TRADE PACT WITH A HANDSHAKE
The feelings of mutual warmth and accomplishment are evident on the faces of Israel's Minister of Industry and Trade Natan Sharansky and his counterpart Minister of International Trade Art Eggleton who signed a Free Trade Agreement between Canada and Israel last week in Toronto. Zundel and Priebke get favorable court rulings

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In a double shock to the Jewish community, a Nazi and a neo-Nazi sympathizer benefited from court decisions thousands of miles apart which stymied legal efforts against them.

In Ottawa, a Federal Court judge ruled that the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC) was prohibited from hearing a case in which Nazi apologist Ernst Zundel was labeled a threat to the security of Canada.

Meanwhile in Italy, a military court ordered the release of former SS Capt. Erich Priebke, despite his involvement in the 1944 Ardeatine Caves massacre in which 335 men and boys, including 75 Jews, were murdered.

Priebke was rearrested eight hours after the court decision, in the wake of anguished protests. He was being held pending an extradition request from Germany.

In Canada, Federal Court Justice Darrel Heald ruled that SIRC should not hear the Zundel case because there was a reasonable apprehension that it was biased against him. The judge found that a 1994 SIRC report on the white supremacist Heritage Front referred to Zundel 20 times and labelled him, Heald said, "a Holocaust denier, hate literature publisher and member of the radical right. SIRC also put Zundel in a category with members of the Heritage Front, the Nationalist party of Canada and aggressive racists. In essence, SIRC characterized Zundel as a radical right-wing racist.

"In my view, the inescapable inference to be drawn from SIRC's characterization of Zundel is that he is included in, or akin to, the extreme right-wing racist groups and the hate-driven groups. In respect of those organizations,

The News in Brief

CANADA

CJC To Meet in Israel

MONTREAL – Canadian Jewish Congress will hold national meetings in Israel from Feb. 23 to March 5, 1997.

Meetings will be held with the Israeli prime minister, the foreign minister and senior government officials.

Net Provider Under Fire

OLIVER, B.C. – A small Internet provider in this Okanagan area which provides access to white supremacist and hate groups is under pressure from local businesses to cut off the groups.

The local newspaper cancelled its Web page from The Fairview Technology Centre, operator of the site, and schools and other businesses are planning to cancel advertising if Fairview persists in retaining such sites as the Freedom-Site and Skin-Net.

New Appointment

TORONTO – Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation was elected president of the 23-member Rabbinical Assembly, Ontario region, an affiliate of the New York-based umbrella organization for some 1,400 rabbis. He succeeds Rabbi Steven Saltzman of Adath Israel Congregation.

ISRAEL

Syria Wants To Talk

JERUSALEM – Syria is insisting that talks with Israel resume where they left off with Labor, a condition that will be difficult, if not impossible for Benjamin Netanyahu's government to meet, sources said.

While Labor says it did not explicitly promise to fully withdraw from the Golan, there have been indications that officials here relayed territorial commitments to the United States, which in turn conveyed its impressions to Damascus.

Victim's Body Found

JERUSALEM – With the help of information supplied by the Palestinian Authority security services, Israel believes it has found the body of Ilan Sa'adon, the IDF soldier kidnapped and murdered by Hamas terrorists seven years ago, near Palmahim.

Ya'acov Perry, former GSS head and now government coordinator for MiAs, insisted there was no exchange involved this time and Israel would not release Hamas spiritual leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin. Perry helped broker the recent return of the bodies of Yosef Fink and Rahamim Alsheikh.

Road Worries Clinton...

JERUSALEM – U.S. President Bill Clinton said last Tuesday he is "concerned" by Israel's National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon's plans to build new roads through the West Bank, but will not make the assumption that the Israeli government stands behind them.

At a press conference with visiting Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, Clinton also sought to reassure the Arab world that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu means to advance the peace process, and urged that he be given time to do so.

...Sharon Defends Plan

JERUSALEM – National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon defended his policies last week as being for "Jews and non-Jews alike."

Under attack for approving the upgrading and construction of two highways in Samaria, Sharon said he has no intention of priorizing one area over another. Furthermore, the plans for work on the two roads were already in place under Yitzhak Rabin's premiership, he said.

ISRAELIS STILL FEAR DIPLOMATIC GAMES

Israeli Chief of Staff General Haim Barlev said the relative quiet which prevails in the Middle East over the Suez Canal issue might not continue for long.

The Israelis are in no mood for diplomatic games. For them, the vital fact is that Egypt's military strength is being reinforced by the Russians while the Americans are hedging on sending the Israelis more Phantom fighter jets. The Israelis fear that the Egyptians, encouraged by Washington's failure to provide Israel with more Phantoms, might be tempted into some rash adventure.

TORONTO IS DESTINATION OF NEW JEWISH EXILES

Quietly, almost imperceptibly, a new wave of Jewish refugees is moving into Canada. Unlike any previous influx, they do not come as family remnants put to flight by the oppression of a tyrant. They come alone or in pairs. And they come from America.

An interfaith committee speculated that there may be as many as 4,000 young American Jews in Toronto. Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld of Temple Emanuel feels that many of these American Jews are not conspicuous because "they are not eager to have a Jewish identity."

The Lowest Burial Cost Available from Any Jewish Establishment

When economy is a major consideration, you should know that Hebrew Basic Burial offers the lowest interment costs available from any Jewish establishment. Keeping burial costs low is in no way a negative reflection on either the family or the departed. Families who have used Hebrew Basic Burial's services have all found that dignity and observance of Jewish law were exactly as they should be.

Low cost is just one of many factors which may be involved in arranging a burial that meets a family's emotional and spiritual needs. We welcome inquiries from people who would like to know more about the option of a basic Jewish graveside service and the savings that go with it.

Eggleton, Sharansky sign free trade agreement

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

TORONTO — Before more than 400 people in the ornate ballroom of the Royal York Hotel in downtown Toronto, Art Eggleton, Canada's minister for International Trade, and Natan Sharansky, Israel's minister of Industry and Trade, signed the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement last week on July 31.

The agreement is scheduled to come into effect on Jan. 1, 1997, pending its ratification by the parliaments of both countries. It is Canada's first free trade agreement with a partner outside North America. Both countries hailed it as unprecedented in its potential mutual benefit.

Indeed, the sweep of the pact is quite comprehensive. Once the agreement takes effect, tariffs will be immediately eliminated on all Canadian and Israeli industrial goods, save two, women's swimwear and certain cotton fabric. The tariffs on these latter products will not be removed immediately, but rather will be phased out over the first 2½ years of the agreement.

It also provides for the reduction or the elimination of tariffs on most agricultural and fisheries products. The parties have excluded dairy, poultry and egg products from the agreement.

Eggleton said by stimulating Canadian exports, the agreement will help create jobs for Canadians, fully one-third of which are related to Canada's foreign trade.

"This agreement symbolizes the direction Canada is taking to further liberalize trade in order to stimulate exports and in turn, create jobs for Canadians," he said.

Noting both the substantive and the symbolic significance of the pact, Sharansky said: "The signing of this agreement is a historic occasion which further solidifies the long-standing relationship between Israel and Canada. Our mutual need for new products will provide significant opportunities for Israeli and Canadian firms."

He added that he felt " [there was] a very special meaning to an agreement with Canada and the Canadian people" who were so helpful to him personally, and to his fellow Soviet refuseniks in their struggles for freedom.

Trade between the countries seems ripe for the hoped-for impetus which officials believe the agreement will provide. Trade between Canada and Israel has been steadily on the rise over the last four years. In 1995, the total value of the two-way trade between the countries reached $450 million, an increase of 37 percent over the previous year.

Canadian exports last year totalled $236.7 million, up 49 percent from 1994. Some of the major Canadian exports have been aluminium, machinery, paper and paperboard, wood pulp, cereals, sulphur and asbestos.

By comparison, Israel exported $240.8 million worth of goods to Canada in 1995, up 32 percent from 1994. The two largest categories of imports were in diamonds and in mechanical and electrical machinery and equipment.

Eggleton specifically referred to two Canada-Israel economic and commercial vehicles already in existence to which prospective Canadian investors can turn to take advantage of the newly signed agreement.

The Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation, the creation of which was announced in 1993 at the Parliamentary dinner of the Canada-Israel Committee, has already approved 11 new projects through its jointly funded investment programs. In addition, the Export Development Corporation offers lines of credit for prospective buyers or exporters seeking financing in Israel.

Palestinians benefit too

Canada also intends to extend the same benefits to the Palestinians that Israel will enjoy under the free trade agreement. It is presently examining ways to achieve this with the Palestinian Authority. Sharansky expressly approved of this intention, saying that "it was very important that free trade operate for the Palestinians too."

Eggleton and Sharansky paid special tribute to the roles played by the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin and by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien in laying the groundwork for the agreement. The possibility of such a free trade agreement was first raised in discussions between the two men during Rabin's visit to Ottawa in 1993.

Rabin further pursued the matter when he was in Ottawa a year later. At that time, he also acknowledged the contribution of the Canada Israel Committee in helping to break down the resistance among certain Canadian government officials to a free trade agreement .

The event generated an outpouring of positive feelings. Steve Victor, national chair of the Canada-Israel Commitee, called the agreement "a tangible expression of the strong ties of friendship between Canada and Israel. The Canadian Jewish community is jubilant about the agreement because it will have tremendous benefits for both countries."

Eggleton pointed to his Israeli counterpart as a "hero, a torchbearer for freedom. You are the embodiment of Israel," Eggleton said, "living for the hopes of the future rather than the hurts of the past."

Perhaps most typical of the feelings felt by the guests, were the sentiments expressed by Goldie Hershon, president of the Canadian Jewish Congress. "Not only is it a momentous and unbelievable occasion to see Natan Sharansky; it is like the realization of a dream."

CORRECTION

In the article, "BBYO Canada closes" that appeared on the front page of The CJN (Aug. 1), there were certain key errors.

Liz Sokolsky has not been dismissed by BBYO. While her position of national BBYO director has been retrenched, the agency has offered and is urging her to assume a new position within the organization. She is presently still employed by BBYO. Miriam Pilc-Levine, who held the position of regional director of Lake Ontario Region BBYO, was not dismissed but rather the position was retrenched.

The CJN regrets these errors.

Observations at the signing of a pact

I had the good fortune last week to represent The CJN at the signing of the Canada-Israel free trade agreement by Art Eggleton, Canada's Minister of International Trade and Natan Sharansky, Israel's Minister of Industry and Trade.

The following are some of the notes that I recorded during the proceedings.

One of the first things one notices about Natan Sharansky is his puckish grin. Despite the small pouches beginning to develop under his eyes, proof of the numerous briefing documents, novels, histories, biographies, math tomes and chess books that occupy him late into the night, he has a remarkably innocent, child-like countenance.

He speaks totally without pretence or prepared text, in command of an English vocabulary which is after all, his second or third language. Occasionally he stops to find the precise word, the one which enables him to convey thoughts and express ideas winnowed to highly refined detail and nuance and meaning.

Five television cameras are filming him. Their lights shine directly into his face. He is oblivious to their intrusion. He sits at a finely polished mahogany or cherry wood table in a high-backed, upholstered chair alongside his gracious Canadian counterpart and host, Art Eggleton. His feet do not quite reach the floor.

Hands folded neatly in front of him, he begins to swing his legs, one resting near the ankle on top of the other, under the table. He is playfully calm. There is very little congruity in my mind between the image of the short legs swinging happily under that table and the phalanx of intergovernmental formality that he faces.

When, as befitting the circumstance and protocol of the occasion, Eggleton greeted him as Your Excellency, he smiled to himself, a subtle proof of his self-deprecation and modesty. He seemed constantly to be smiling very broadly.

Apart from the women in attendance and the men in the camera crews, he was the only person in the room not wearing a tie.

And then it was his turn to speak. "Dear Friends, not only is this the first agreement that I am signing as minister, it is the very first agreement I have ever signed in all my life."

The canons of diplomacy and ministerial peerage dictated that certain protocols be followed, despite the personal inclinations of the individuals involved. Thus, Sharansky addressed Eggleton as The Honorable; Eggleton addressed Sharansky as Your Excellency. Eggleton told the gathering that Sharansky had whispered to him at one point that at the end of the day he would consult his dictionary to check the difference.

At the luncheon, the two ministers exchanged enthusiastic, warm greetings for each other and for the occasion, which has exceeded by effusive, daring dimensions a merely beneficial business arrangement between countries. An excitement far more rewarding than the thought of potential profits hovered tangibly in the air.

Of course, the excitement was in seeing Anatoly Shcharansky, Jewish refusenik, human rights activist, Soviet dissident, mathematician, prisoner of Zion, now Natan Sharansky, citizen of Israel, resident of Jerusalem, member of the Knesset, cabinet minister in the government of Israel. Nineteen years ago he was locked away in the Gulag. Ten years ago he walked out of it. And now, there he sat in front of us, unassuming but amazing, like a beautiful blue sky after a frightening, dark storm, a reminder that ordinary human life bears the greatest dignity and that the storm can make us tremble.

No one was immune to the feeling that we were at a very special occasion. Nor could anyone ever remember seeing people line up for hours at the table of a cabinet minister to get his autograph, to speak to him, to touch him, to simply say hello, congratulations, thank you, it was your courage that helped us to walk.

These are excerpts of Sharansky's words to the court before he was sentenced to 13 years imprisonment. We do well to read them again.

"My relatives and friends know how strong was my desire to join my wife in Israel, and with what joy at any moment I would have exchanged my so-called fame as a Jewish activist — for which the charge asserts I was striving — for a visa to Israel. For 2,000 years, the Jewish people, my people, have been dispersed all over the world and seemingly deprived of any hope of returning. But still, each year Jews have stubbornly, and apparently without reason, said to each other, L'shanah haba'ah b'Yerushalayim.

"And today, when I am further than ever from my dream, from my people, and from my Avital, and when difficult years of prisons and camps lie ahead of me, I say to my wife and to my people, L'shanah haba'ah b'Yerushalayim.

"And to the court, which has only to read a sentence that was prepared long ago — to you I have nothing to say."

Individuals can and do change the course of human history. The man sitting in front of us, smiling, attentive, legs swinging playfully under the table, proves it to be so.

Netanyahu gets passing grade, Congress regional meeting told

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In its first month in office, the Netanyahu government earned a passing grade, two experts on the Israeli state agreed at a special meeting of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress.

"But we can't presume that it will be as smooth in the future as in the last few weeks," said Jehudi Kinar, Israel consul general for Ontario and Western Canada.

Returning from Israel where he met Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Foreign Minister David Levy, region chair Moshe Ronen said that "tidings are good," and that Netanyahu had moved quickly to repair damage to Israel's relations with the Arab world by his speech to the U.S. Congress.

Ronen also said Netanyahu's image was tarnished badly by his capitulation to Levy on the Ariel Sharon appointment to cabinet and that Israeli journalists were describing the Israeli prime minister as one "who talks tough but bends to pressure easily."

Levy and Sharon represent a "tough opposition" to the prime minister, he said.

The feeling in Israel is that serious progress must be made in peace negotiations in the next few months, or else there will be a stalemate, Ronen said.

In answer to questions moderated by executive director Manuel Prutschi, Kinar said that he himself opposes the haredi attempts to block a major thoroughfare in Jerusalem and that "the mass of Orthodox Jews do not support the haredi on this."

As for the timetable for withdrawal from Hebron, Kinar said that no decision has been made, that security for the settlers is preeminent, that the Israeli prime minister does not like the Hebron agreement made by the previous government and that he would like to rediscuss it.

Ronen said Netanyahu is comparing his government to that of Menachem Begin rather than that of Itzak Shamir and this bodes well.

The cut of "several billion dollars" in U.S. aid to Israel promised by Netanyahu has had a serious impact on the Israeli economy and represents a serious threat to fundraising in the Diaspora, Ronen warned. "My present view is that it won't happen as quickly as he announced. I am not criticizing government policy on this."

Kinar said the world media have been unfair to Netanyahu and had failed to report that the Israeli government was able to discourage the French foreign minister from visiting the PLO-sponsored Orient House in Jerusalem.

Netanyahu stubbed his toe diplomatically in calling for democratic elections in the Arab world, Ronen said, and "Levy had to remind him that not every speech he makes is to the American Zionist Council."

In Israel it is felt that "while Perez drowned in the election, Arafat only swallowed water," Ronen commented, adding that he was confident Netanyahu and Arafat will resume neotiations toward peace under Levy's guidance.

CHAT teacher, student receive unique double honor

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Graeme Mawson, a science teacher at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), strives to imbue his students with a love of learning and the skills to continue their education. In a unique double honor, the 45-year-old educator's efforts were recognized, along with the accomplishments of a former student.

Eytan Szmuilowicz, 23, a recent Psychology graduate of Cornell University, is to begin medical studies at Harvard University next year. The 1991 CHAT graduate was awarded Cornell University's prestigious Merrill Presidential Scholarship on completing his undergraduate studies earlier this year at the Ithaca, N.Y. campus.

In an interesting twist, the 35 Merrill Presidential scholars — chosen for outstanding scholastic achievement, strong leadership ability and potential for contributing to society — are asked to choose the high school teacher who influenced them the most. For Mawson, being chosen by Szmuilowicz was "a marvellous surprise."

A STAR (Special Teachers Are Recognized) award worth $4,000 (US) is established in each teacher's name, to go to a future Cornell student over a period of four years. As it is standard practice to help students in each teacher's jurisdiction, Mawson's award will be given to a CHAT student if possible. If not, a student will be sought from Toronto or, failing that, from Ontario or elsewhere in Canada.

Mawson, along with 34 teachers from as far away as Europe and Asia, was flown to Ithaca for a two-day celebration which included the awards ceremony.

"[Mawson] presented the material in a very challenging way. I found his classes inspiring. He always asked us to think," recalls Szmuilowicz, who was in Mawson's Biology classes in grades 9, 11 and 12.

Mawson, in turn, recalls Szmuilowicz — who is program director at Camp Solelim this summer before leaving to volunteer in Israel for a year — as being "very focused, but open-minded ... an extraordinary young man."

In his undergraduate years at Cornell, Szmuilowicz was involved in intramural basketball and softball, served as vice-president of the Alpha Epsilon Delta premedical honor society and worked as a medical assistant for eight semesters at a campus health clinic. He graduated in the top one percent of his class.

Just knowing that Szmuilowicz and his 34 co-recipients exist has been reassuring for Mawson. "It made me feel much better about [the] future."

Adoptee tracks down the truth about her birth

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Before Elisabeth Birnbaum can "close the book" on emotionally painful aspects of her life, the 51-year-old Hungarian-born woman — who found out only six years ago that she was adopted — wants to learn as much as she can about her early childhood and the circumstances of her birth.

Recently, thanks to an ad she placed in the Toronto-based Hungarian-language newspaper Menorah, she was able to "write another page."

Romanian-born Irene Csillag, an ex-Montrealer who moved here six years ago, was a child care worker at the Louise Wise Children's Home in Budapest where Birnbaum spent the earliest part of her life. It was Csillag's husband who spotted Birnbaum's ad seeking former employees of the orphanage, run in the post-war years by the Joint Distribution Committee.

Birnbaum phoned Csillag immediately on receiving the reply to her ad, and they arranged to meet.

Elisabeth Birnbaum, left, and Irene Csillag were brought together after 50 years by an ad in a Hungarian Jewish newspaper. [Frances Kraft photo]

"They were happy kids, well looked after," recalls Csillag. "In the morning we would play games like tag, and after lunch they would take a nap. If the weather was nice, we took out blankets and they would lie down on the grass. They all had their own beds. They never slept two to a bed. I don't know how anybody else took care of them, but every one [of my kids], I loved."

Birnbaum derived great pleasure from meeting "somebody who was near to me when I was without family." As it turned out, Csillag was the only one to reply to Birnbaum's ad, but she said she would ask a Montreal friend who worked with her whether she remembers Birnbaum or has old photos.

Although Birnbaum has no conscious memory of the orphanage, she was dumbstruck on a 1992 visit to Hungary to recognize the institution's heart-shaped wrought iron window bars that had appeared in her dreams for years.

As a child and well into adulthood, Birnbaum was plagued by suspicions that she had been adopted and feelings that something "wasn't right" about her early childhood. She repeatedly looked in vain for family resemblances and received only evasive answers to questions about her birth.

It wasn't until 1990, after both her parents had died and once she herself was a mother of two grown daughters and in a happy second marriage, that her determined probing finally yielded the truth.

Unlike some of the other children at the home, whose parents were unable to care for them but came to see them every weekend, Birnbaum had no family. She been placed as a newborn by her birth mother, a Jewish woman then in her mid-40s.

Birnbaum was able to locate her mother on a trip to Hungary, and she still calls her regularly, although the elderly woman does not wish to discuss the past. "I want to know she is alive," says Birnbaum. "It gives me some calmness to hear her voice."

She carries pictures of both her adoptive parents and her birth mother in her wallet. "I truly honor my adoptive parents," she affirms. "They gave me all the love they could. There's only one thing they didn't give me: the truth, and it's haunting me until today."

A delicate structure

There was neither pomp nor pageantry. Anyone who has ever been near him or watched him in action knows that Natan Sharansky, Israel's Minister of Industry and Trade, is the very antithesis of pomp and pageantry. He probably would have been that way even had he not fought the KGB, had he not been falsely accused, falsely tried, falsely convicted and locked away in prison for nine years. He is simply too honest.

But the occasion was indeed full of circumstance.

Canada and Israel last week signed a free trade agreement (FTA) which, observers agree, is of great potential benefit to both signatories. Sharansky referred to the agreement as the "best FTA yet between two nations."

The agreement will eliminate tariffs on industrial goods and also eliminate or reduce tariffs on most agricultural and fisheries products. This will result in significant opportunities for increased trade directly between the two nations. In addition, it greatly improves access to new markets for both countries' goods. For Canadians, Israel may turn out to be the gateway to the larger and more lucrative market of the Middle East, not to mention the former Soviet Union from which more than 700,000 Israelis have made aliyah in the past seven years.

The agreement, we hope, will be far more than the foundation of expanding common commercial interests between the two countries. We hope it will also be a supportive pylon sunk deep into the soil of long-lasting regional peace. The FTA encourages Canadian contact, using Israel as the medium, with Middle Eastern consumers and business. The more extensive that contact, the greater the chances of more widely felt regional economic benefit. Wide beneficial investment usually contributes to political stability.

Peace, especially in the troubled, evolving Middle East, is a delicate, interrelated economic-political structure. A successfully implemented FTA can help to buttress that structure. We commend the governments of Canada and Israel for signing the agreement, for seeing the potential benefits to their own citizens, and for seeing the potential benefits for the people of the Middle East.

Lebanon first?

Events last week made it apparent that, despite his empty public rhetoric and hand-wringing about the peace process after the Israeli elections, Syrian President Hafez al-Assad fully believes he can arrive at a deal with Benjamin Netanyahu.

Reports circulated in the Israeli press that on the eve of his visit to the United States, Netanyahu secretly received a Syrian envoy to discuss the possibility of concluding an arrangement in south Lebanon. The development was dubbed the "Lebanon first" track.

According to the respected commentator Ze'ev Schiff of Ha'aretz, the secret visit was not initiated by Israel. Ha'aretz also reported that while the prime minister was in Washington, one of his advisors, Dore Gold, met with the Syrian ambassador to the United States to follow up the discussions held furtively the week before in Jerusalem. Further fuelling the whispers about the possibility of "Lebanon first" with Syria, was the mysterious trip taken out of the country by the prime minister last week. Again, the Israeli media speculated on Netanyahu's destination and concluded that he had travelled to meet French president Jacques Chirac. This was proved subsequently not to have been his destination.

The question for the media should not be whether Israel can achieve "Lebanon first," but rather, whether "Syria, at all." Israel's willingness to take part in these clandestine meetings, to travel reasonable roads, suggests that it is pursuing "Syria, if possible," but not "Syria, at all costs."

Appalled by actions of Southern Baptists

As a Christian, I was appalled to read of the ill-intentioned efforts of the Southern Baptist Convention and other groups aimed at "converting" followers of Judaism.

Rather than demonstrate what is clearly religious intolerance for views that differ from their own, these groups would do better to learn about and respect the richness of perspective that characterizes the Jewish religion for its own sake. Although Judaism does not understand the person of Jesus in the same way as does Christianity, all Christians would do well to reflect on how the Jews and their unique experience of suffering in history culminating in the Holocaust, are a people who have themselves been crucified, time and again, for their faithfulness to their God and His laws.

It should be the responsibility of Christians today to redress past and present injustices committed against Jews and work with the Jewish people on common, contemporary moral and ethical issues, while coming to a progressively deeper understanding of the Semitic basis of their own religious perspective which owes so much to Judaism.

Charges Likud election ads destroyed

It has long been the contention of Likud supporters, that the recently defeated Labor/Meretz government has turned the institutions of the Israeli government into partisan political instruments.

The army, police, secret services, justice and education systems were all politicized to an unprecedented degree.

Now comes confirmation that not even the postal system was immune from political interference.

According to the Ma'ariv newspaper, (July 30, p. 11) the Postal Authority legal advisor issued a report that the Postal Service intentionally did not deliver some 250,000 Likud election advertisements. Following the elections, the literature was destroyed.

Bernard Betel honors volunteers

At our annual Volunteer Appreciation Dinner, we dedicated the evening to our late Rose Greenglass who chaired the volunteer committee for many years.

Rose and Cyril Magrill were recognized for their 22 years of untiring and devoted volunteering. Cyril is 88 years old and Rose is slightly younger.

Yvonne Martel, the president of the board of directors, was recognized with the presentation of a gavel for the many years she has served on the board as a community volunteer.

An annual visitor to our centre who comes from Sydney, Australia, Aaron Aaron, 81, is a lifetime volunteer. He has served the Sydney Jewish community as well as the senior community for over 50 years.

Prosecution of war criminals hits roadblock

One Federal government after another has been pushed and prodded to bring Canada's Nazi war criminals to justice. Even with the passage of enabling legislation to prosecute or to denaturalize and deport, the pace has been painfully slow. Now, Mr. Justice Bud Cullen has stayed proceedings against three alleged Nazi war criminals citing the impropriety of Assistant Deputy Attorney General Ted Thompson's meeting with Chief Justice Julius Isaac without defence counsel being present. The absolute irony of this decision is that Justice Minister Allan Rock has appointed former Ontario chief justice Charles Dubin to ascertain if the holding of the meeting was improper and then to deliver a report.

Again, notwithstanding the gratuitous comments of Cullen that genocidal practices of the Nazis and their collaborators were heinous and should not go unpunished, the fact remains that whether by reason of political inertia or a judicial nit-picking, that is precisely the result taking place in Canada. Hitler must be laughing in his grave.

A cold wind blows through Germany

By GOLDIE HERSHON

A cold wind always blows here, said Dr. Volkgard Knigge, the director of the Buchenwald Concentration Camp Museum located only a stone's throw from the historic German village of Weimar. Indeed, this statement would haunt us throughout our trip.

Following an invitation from the German ambassador to Canada, we left on May 1 for a fact-finding mission sponsored by the German government. It was not going to be an easy voyage.

As Canadian Jewish Congress president, I was more than aware of the need to be both objective and subjective about this trip. For my colleague, Bernie Farber, our national director of Community Relations, it would be different. Bernie is a child of a Holocaust survivor. His father Max had lost his entire family — a wife, two children, eight brothers and sisters, aunts, uncles and cousins to the genocidal fury of the Nazi regime.

We set foot on German soil and felt the cold wind.

Nonetheless, what became clear as we travelled from village to town and from town to city was that Germany had changed. From the beauty of the Rhine Valley to the hustle and bustle of Berlin, today's Germany is a modern technological state striving to accomplish and find its future.

But what of its Nazi past? This was the question that would reverberate through our entire 10-day journey of discovery.

The first part of our answer came when we visited the International Tracing Service (ITS) of the Red Cross located in picturesque Arolsen, 25 kilometres outside of Frankfurt. The ITS was established during World War II, when it became obvious that the civilian population which had undergone so much suffering would be in need of international help. The task of the ITS was to assist in the search for missing relatives, survivors and, most importantly, to confirm the persecution that was suffered during the war years.

It was a daunting responsibility. Foreign names from various parts of Europe were constantly misspelled. For example, a name like Schwartz could have had countless variations. The usual waiting period from time of request to completion could be more than two years. To this day, more than 100,000 inquiries arrive at the ITS annually.

It was at the ITS that our personal Jewish past intersected with the present and the future. To find out exactly how the ITS system worked, Bernie asked to see the references to his name — Farber. There were over 3,000 requests, references or information on the name Farber spelled in 80 different ways.

Miraculously, the fourth card Bernie spotted was the original "displaced person" registration record filled out by his late father at the Pocken displaced persons camp in 1946. Upon further investigation, officials at the ITS were able to pull out the entire file and provide him with information on his father and family that he had not previously seen. And once again the cold wind went through us.

A few days later, in Bonn, we met with a number of German government officials to discuss matters ranging from Holocaust denial to Canadian multiculturalism and national unity. These meetings reinforced our impression that Germany was changing. Through the funding of projects for mandatory Holocaust education in German schools, today's Germany on a day-to-day basis struggles with its past in order to come to grips with its present.

This displaced person registration card was filled out after the war by Bernie Farber's late father, Max, to help in the search for missing relatives.

Government officials spoke with disdain about Canadian landed immigrant and German citizen Ernst Zundel, the notorious denier of the Holocaust. German officials remain determined to work with Canadian law enforcement on Holocaust denial.

Officials from the Ministry of Culture also spoke proudly of the funding provided to the House of the Wannsee Conference Memorial. The Wannsee home where the memorial is now situated was opened on Jan. 20, 1992 — the 50th anniversary of the infamous Wannsee Conference. Fifty years earlier, Reinhard Heidrich, head of the NS Reich Security Main Office, had chaired a meeting of 14 high-ranking civil servants and SS officers in this "Wannsee village." Its purpose was to organize and implement the so-called Final Solution — the decision to deport and ultimately murder the Jews of Europe.

The home is situated in a lovely suburban district of Berlin surrounded by lush trees, with the meandering Wannsee River running behind the villa itself. The director of the memorial, Dr. Gerhard Schoenberner, a pre-eminent Holocaust historian and author of The Yellow Star and The Holocaust, has made it his goal to ensure that Germans have a firm historical grip on the Holocaust, its impact on Germany and more specifically on European Jewry.

The exhibition is devastating. Through stark pictures and the frank accompanying text, it provides basic information about the entire process of the segregation, persecution and genocide of European Jewry. It is poignant and heartbreaking. Standing in the actual "Wannsee Villa," we could once again feel the cold wind blowing.

To be sure, the German government did not stop solely at funding the Wannsee memorial. While actual death camps operated by the Nazi regime were not located on German territory, concentration camps where thousands were murdered, both Jews and non-Jews, did operate in Germany with cold, murderous efficiency.

Near the end of our journey, we visited one of those camps, Buchenwald.

Buchenwald is located 10 miles from Weimar (in what was previously East Germany). Situated in the midst of the Thuringia Forest, Weimar is the home of such classic writers as Johann Wolfgang von Goethe and Friedrich Schiller, and composers Franz Liszt and Johann Sebastian Bach. Our hotel, Hotel Elephant, is one of the most famous inns in all of Europe. Built in the early 16th century, the famous and the infamous, including Adolf Hitler, stayed at the hotel. Despite all the changes, there remain constant reminders of what once was.

The Buchenwald camp is a 25-minute drive from Weimar up rolling hills surrounded by thick forest. When we left Weimar, the sun was shining; when we entered the gates of Buchenwald, it became bitter cold and a fine mist fell.

The name Buchenwald was chosen because the inhabitants of Weimar found it unacceptable to give the name of a "concentration camp" to a place (Weimar) associated with Goethe, Germany's most prolific author. Interestingly, however, in the mid-1930s, prior to Buchenwald's being operated as a full concentration camp, the crematoria in the town of Weimar were utilized by the Buchenwald camp administration to incinerate the bodies of those who died through execution or forced labor.

At one point, we stood on the field overlooking Barracks 66, the Children's Barracks. Today, it is a memorial to the Jewish children who were murdered here. It seemed appropriate that the harsh weather served as a reminder of the 56,000 persons who lost their lives here. And the cold wind continued to blow.

From Frankfurt to Koblenz, from Koblenz to Bonn, Bonn to Berlin, Berlin to Weimar, Weimar to Leipzig, and then back home, the trip to Germany was difficult, yet at the same time an eye-opening at the prospect of visiting the country where in our lifetime, plans were formulated to murder our people. We could not help but feel pain in travelling the land where individuals still reside who helped carry out those monstrous plans.

Yet, it is clear that today's Germany is not yesterday's Germany.

Our talks with German Jewish community leaders seemed to support the work being done by the German government in areas dealing with their terrible history. But a question mark remains in the minds of many German Jews. While they appear to be grateful and assured by the progress of today's Germany, they know, too, that 50 years may not yet be enough time for that assurance to be complete.

There is a renewed spirit in Germany. There is also memory. As a result, German law makes it a criminally indictable offence to spread Nazism and Holocaust denial. German law enforcement has been more diligent in the last few years in enforcing these laws, certainly more diligent than law enforcement in our own country.

We did note one interesting phenomenon: Germany does not have a museum dedicated to the memory of the Holocaust. And yet, everywhere you step in Germany becomes a memorial to the Holocaust.

As we prepared to board our plane back to Canada, the fragrance of flowers was in the air. The sun shone brightly along the Rhine — and yet, a cold wind still blew — but with less of a chill.

Ominous developments in Israel

By Jean M. Gerber

What do the Israeli elections and the summer blockbuster film Independence Day have in common? For one, they both blast you out of your seat with their unexpected action; for another, they both presumed an external enemy of horrific proportions and reacted accordingly.

There is one significant difference between the two: in the film, Arab and Israeli band together to fight alien invaders who threaten the world with their "No Peace" dictum. In real life, Israelis have had second thoughts about the direction of the peace process and possibilities for détente with their neighbors. The recent elections revealed how un-united the Jewish state is, and how disunified Jews in Israel and abroad remain and are likely to grow.

First, the election of the prime minister. Like many candidates who squeak through, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has forgotten that fewer than 30,000 votes divided him from his rival, Shimon Peres. Netanyahu comes with an entourage of both Israeli and American neo-conservatives ready to "recreate the Zionist vision." Since it is Israelis who elected him and his new vision, it is they who will first bear the brunt of the changes – like the increased power of the Prime Minister's Office – for which they may not have voted. Second, the threat. Israelis must now decide how they will deal with their new-found insecurity.

Finally, unity. Here, I believe we Jews outside Israel, who love and support the state, have a right to speak. Some years back "We are one" was the basis of Combined/United Jewish Appeals. Unfortunately, it is not true. We are not one, but many communities.

In Israel, due to the system of voting slates of candidates, the religious parties will continue to muster their followers to protect what they perceive as their best interests, and to enforce those interests on those who did not vote for such imposition. Will Judaism benefit? Coerced religiosity, as we have found out when confronted with conversionist oppressors, doesn't work in the long term.

The showing of Natan Sharansky's party revealed the rift between immigrant and sabra. It remains to be seen whether this honorable man can speak for all immigrants, including the excluded Ethiopians, or whether the Russian card will dominate the agenda. The failure of immigration policies to make one out of the many communities in Israel is another sign that we are not one. How Sharansky's party and the Likud/religious parties connection will light up the skies remains to be seen.

Another ominous development is the re-emergence of the demand from the religious parties for Knesset action to overturn Israel's Supreme Court decisions (as well as government administrative actions) that recognized Conservative and Reform conversions, celebration of other Jewish rites and participation in governance by community councils. The schools and institutions set up by these denominations are also anticipating increased obstacles to their operation. For some reason which eludes me, the eradication of rights for those who form the majority of Jews in North America is a high priority item for the religious parties, right up there with getting their preferred cabinet positions.

Well, Mr. Prime Minister. You have a keen sense of history. So go back and read what happened the last time we endured the debate on Who is a Jew and what is she? Please don't reopen it.

As Canadians we are (supposedly) comfortable with the model of many peoples, one nation. Multiculturalism was the order of the night at Vancouver's recent July 1 celebrations. But as Jews we shrink from the notion that we can be a culture of many multis. That is precisely what the recent elections in Israel gave us.

That is precisely how we in North America need to live. Pro-Labor speakers may get booed by pro-Likud audiences (and maybe vice-versa). But we in Vancouver at least go to each other's weddings, simchahs, shivahs, generally respecting the denomination of our Jewish neighbor. For some reason, that same ability to live with the people to the left and right of us is in short supply in Israel. The very state is threatened, our future as a people menaced, when a Reform rabbi gets up to bless the congregation or marry a young Israeli couple. We here need not give our blessing to attempts by Israeli parties to read us out of the community.

This is not to say that civil war is on the horizon. But a continuous erosion of mutual respect and actions which drive further wedges between Jew and Jew, between Israel and Diaspora communities, are ominous signs that we are failing to live up to our multicultural reality.

Missionaries at my door

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Many of you will have had this experience: the bell rings and you open the door for two nicely dressed people — sometimes mother and child — who present you with some literature. "We'd like you to read this," they say, "God is waiting for you."

The witnesses will identify themselves as belonging to Jehovah's witnesses or some other missionary group.

Recently, on the Internet, I read a posting by Rabbi Amy Scheinerman, who had a fascinating encounter with such visitors to her home in Columbia, Md. (I have obtained the rabbi's permission to tell the story as she did.)

A little more than a year ago, they visited one afternoon when my kids were all at home. The first missionary, seeing a mezuzah on the door, introduced herself as a former Jew and asked, "Do you like bible stories?"

"Oh yes," I replied innocently.

She then asked whether I would like to study the Bible with her. In mock amazement I answered, "You can read the Bible? Really? How wonderful! Where did you learn Hebrew?"

Startled and off-balance she responded, "I don't read Hebrew, I read it in English."

"But it's not written in English," I said quickly, "only translations are in English. If you believe that the Bible is God's word, I expect that you would read it as God wrote it — in Hebrew."

She explained that Hebrew was very difficult to learn and that she had great confidence in her translation. At this juncture I sent my 5-year-old daughter, Naomi, to fetch a Chumash. When she returned I asked her to read a few passages to our visitor. I then announced that I would study with her only if she could read the Bible the way it was written.

She hurried away, and we have not been bothered by Jehovah's witnesses since.

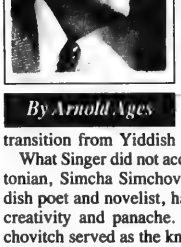
I recount this story not because I reckon that many readers will follow Rabbi Scheinerman's example, but if some of you do, please let me know so that I can follow up this column with your experience. Fortunately we have a lot of Hebrew readers in Canada, and I suspect that they have no difficulty locating a Chumash in their home. But others may have a more serious problem: they wouldn't readily know where to find their Bible (if they have one).

My own experience, garnered from decades of visits to people's homes, suggests to me that their Bibles must be on their night tables in the bedroom, for they don't seem to make their presence readily known on their library shelves.

When I once discussed this issue with someone who possessed a rather wide learning in many areas, he confessed that he hadn't looked at the book since he was bar mitzvah. Then he added that he did have Jewish books, even though he was unacquainted with the Bible, and mentioned Alan Dershowitz's Chutzpah as an example.

I forget whether his addendum tickled my funny bone or caused my tear ducts to work. Maybe it was both.

Poems a treasure trove of Jewish memory



By Arnold Ages

It was Isaac Bashevis Singer who once remarked that although Yiddish was the Stradivarius of languages, its sweet melodies would not necessarily be heard in future generations. Singer, of course, continued to write in Yiddish, but it was the English translations of his novels which earned him the Nobel Prize in literature. Although Singer was very fluent in English he never made the literary transition from Yiddish to Eglish.

What Singer did not accomplish, a Torontonian, Simcha Simchovitch, a noted Yiddish poet and novelist, has done with skill, creativity and panache. Until 1988, Simchovitch served as the knowledgeable curator of the Beth Tzedec Museum and in that post displayed his great learning in Bible, the classical Jewish sources, Yiddish, Hebrew and of course, art.

After retiring from his position at the Toronto synagogue he returned to what was undoubtedly his first love, Yiddish poetry. In that language, he was able to make the lyre sing poignant songs of his youth in Poland, adolescence and young adulthood in Siberia and latterly his half century domicile in Toronto. His Yiddish poetry has been acclaimed for its strong lyrical quality, terse but provocative imagery and reverential reconstruction of Jewish life in Poland before and during the Holocaust.

In the last decade, however, Simchovitch has done something which very few writers and even fewer poets have done — made the transition from their mother tongue to an adopted language on the same artistic level. In Israel, of course, a number of fine poets made the switch from Yiddish to Hebrew, but a successful jump from Yiddish to English has been rare. Simchovitch shows in his most recent work, A Song Will Remain, that it is indeed possible. I would add that it is a salutary development because it affords non-Yiddish readers an opportunity to experience Simchovitch's poetic vision for the first time.

In the 159 poems in his current collection, all the poems are in English: Simchovitch has translated some of them by himself, while others are translated by Ben Kaminker, Sylvia Lustgarten, Miriam Rand, Faye Kellerstein and Gurion Hyman. The majority of the poems, especially those dealing with Canada, Toronto and the métier of the poet itself, are written in English by Simchovich. All the poems are collectively a treasure trove of Jewish memory, a celebration of humanity and a hymn of praise to Canada's multicultural mosaic.

As one of the sole survivors of the Polish resort town Otwock, Simchovitch devotes a number of his first poems to memorializing the simplicity, piety and beauty of the men and women who inhabited that world. There is no treacly sentimentalism in his word pictures as the poet records his obligation to act as a witness to lives lived and lives extinguished. Simchovitch registers his affection and admiration for Jewish socialists and Bundists whose lives intersected his and who perished in the Holocaust. In one remarkable song, he speaks of an aging survivor who wants to be cremated so that his ashes can commingle, at least metaphorically, with the martyred millions who preceded him.

Simchovitch survived the war in Spaask, a Siberian town on the Oka River. It was there that his life was not only saved, but his dignity as a human being was preserved. There he also learned a trade and then went on to complete his education. In several of his poems, he renders homage to the simple men and women in Russia who helped restore his faith in humanity at the time when the Swastika was blotting out the sun.

"More than five decades later,/ my heart melts when I recall/ their unrewarded humane deeds/ and my lips utter quietly a prayer/ for these, so far-away, yet so close."

Simchovitch, true to his Hebrew first name, has found joy since he came to Canada and in most of the poems in the second half of his recent collection, presents a stunning kaleidoscope of impressions about Toronto, Harbourfront Place, Muskoka and scores of other typically Canadian vistas. His vision is a happy one as he ponders the richness of Canada's ethnic diversities and babble of languages. However, even in the comfort of Canada's tolerant ambiance, Simchovitch records his anxieties about life, politics and human foibles — all in skillfully chiseled verse.

than a thing or two about Jerusalem. This is readily evident from reading his latest book, Jerusalem: An Archaeological Biography (Random House, $63), which is comprehensive in scope.

Replete with excellently reproduced color photographs and helpful charts, this thoroughly researched compendium is a first-class guide to the ruins and artifacts of Jerusalem from the era before the Israelite conquest to the Muslim and Crusader periods.

City of the Great King: Jerusalem From David to the Present (Harvard University Press, $39.95 US), edited by Nitza Rosovsky, is an excellent primer. In this handsomely illustrated volume, Jerusalem is conjured up in ancient Hebrew texts, in medieval Islamic literature, in 19th-century Western accounts and in the testimony of Jewish and Christian pilgrims. A perfect way to mark Jerusalem's 3,000th anniversary as a capital.

As its title suggests, Jerusalem: One City, Three Faiths (Random House, $42) expertly explores the connections which bind Judaism, Islam and Christianity to this fought-over city. Karen Armstrong's central thesis is that a community's attachment to Jerusalem grows more powerful when its links have been re-established after being severed.

The complexity of Jerusalem's politics is examined by Roger Friedland and Richard Hecht in To Rule Jerusalem (Cambridge University Press, $39.95 US). Jerusalem, they argue persuasively, is not only contested by Israelis and Palestinians, but is a battleground for conflicts within each of these communities.

Jerusalem's place in Judaism is but one of the numerous topics explored at length by Norman Cantor in The Sacred Chain: The History of the Jews (HarperCollins, $21). Cantor's book, though relatively concise, is sweeping in its erudition.

The late Lucy Dawidowicz was an admirable historian. In What is the Use of Jewish History? (Random House, $19.95), her essays have been collected under one roof. Dawidowicz, whose range was impressive, grapples with a wide variety of subjects, from her musings about Berlin and Babi Yar to her impressions of Polish-Jewish relations and Jewish identity in America.

Neil Folberg's handsome coffee-table book, And I Shall Dwell Among Them: Historic Synagogues of the World (General, $72), focuses on synagogue exteriors and interiors in the Mediterranean basin, Asia, the Americas, the Caribbean, Europe and Israel.

Sheldon and Judy Godfrey, in Search Out the Land (McGill-Queen's University Press, $34.95), have written an important book about the struggle by minorities for equal civil and political rights in this country. The focus is on early Jewish settlers who took part in this battle. The research is based on archival, legal and genealogical sources.

Alienated Minority: The Jews of Medieval Latin Europe (Harvard University Press, $19.95 US) is Kenneth Stow's scholarly account of the precarious position of Western European Jewry from the fifth to the 15th century. Stow argues that in spite of their lowly status, Jews contributed to the shaping of Europe's social and ideological structures.

In Prisoners of Honor (Fitzhenry & Whiteside, $18.95), David Levering Lewis retells an old but instructive story — the plight of Captain Alfred Dreyfus and the affair which plunged France into warring camps for about a decade.

German Jews in the United States began as itinerant peddlers and small merchants. By the 20th century, they had built business empires. In Encounter with Emancipation (Jewish Publication Society of America, $25.95), a well-documented work, Naomi Cohen relates the manner in which they were Americanized, their encounters with prejudice and their rise to social prominence.

During the 1930s, Jewish intellectuals fleeing oppression in Nazi Germany and other countries found a haven in the United States. Nearly 200 of these refugees came to be affiliated with the New School for Social Research in New York City. Intellectuals in Exile (University of Massachusetts Press, $15.95 US), by Claus-Dieter Krohn, looks at their lives and contributions in their chosen fields.

Lise Meitner, an Austrian Jew, was one of the foremost physicists of our time, a brilliant woman forced into exile by Hitler. Ruth Sime's richly detailed biography, Lise Meitner (University of California Press, $30 US), will be of particular interest to readers with a scientific bent.

The People Speak! Anti-Semitism and Emancipation in Nineteenth-Century Bavaria (Fitzhenry & Whiteside, $62.95) sounds like an arcane treatise, but it really isn't. James Harris' book, a study of the effects of public opinion on state policy, traces the links between the treatment of Jews in 18th- and 19th-century Germany and the anti-Semitism of the Nazi movement.

Race and ethnicity have figured prominently in the so-called Jewish Question. Integral to it were the late 19th-century debates as to whether there was a biological basis for Jewish distinctiveness. In Defenders of the Race: Jewish Doctors and Race Scientists in Fin-de-Siecle Europe (Yale University Press, $30 US), John Efron delves into this murky field by studying the growth of race science, the Jewish representation in it and its overall relationship to Zionism.

While we're on the subject of race, consider Joel Kotkin's fascinating book, Tribes: How Race, Religion and Identity Determine Success in the New Global Economy (Random House, $24 US). Kotkin argues that as national borders dissolve and the world becomes increasingly interdependent, five "tribes" — Jews, Chinese, Japanese, Indians and British — will become the dominant forces in world economies. A bizarre thesis? Judge for yourself.

Former Nazi concentration camps like Auschwitz and Buchenwald are searing symbols of man's inhumanity to man. In the Camps (Penguin, $45) is yet one more glimpse of these charnel houses, as viewed through the camera of German-born photographer Erich Hartmann. Hartmann's photos are spare and graphic, speaking the language of horror and death.

Embattled Selves (Atlantic Monthly Press, $24 US), by Kenneth Jacobson, presents the life stories of 15 Jewish men and women who, in response to the Holocaust, concealed, discovered, embraced or rejected their Jewishness. These are compelling tales told by a master of the narrative.

Holocaust Denial: Bigotry in the Guise of Scholarship (Simon Wiesenthal Centre, no price listed) is a valuable addition to the growing literature of the Holocaust. It will be of special interest to educators and students. The authors are Frances Henry and Carol Tator, who handily demolish the pseudo arguments of the revisionists.

A colorful tapestry

God Has Ninety-Nine Names by Judith Miller, Random House $40

The Islamic world of the high Middle Ages — perhaps, more than any other — offered great promise of advancing toward a modern, multi-racial and universal civilization. Instead it entered into a long process of decline as it failed to compete with the power, ideas and skills of European culture. Vast territories were lost to foreign powers. Islamic pride and notions of superiority gave way to feelings of pain, envy and bitterness.

This book (the title is inspired by the fact that the Koran has 99 names for God), weaves a rich and colorful tapestry that contains multiple strands from eight Arab countries in the Middle Ages, as well as Iran and Israel. Judith Miller has been a correspondent for the New York Times since 1977 and was Cairo bureau chief for the Times from 1983 to 1986.

Through her highly personal and informative reportage, the author conveys the country by country struggle now underway between a secularism and various forms of resurgent Islam. She travelled the length and breadth of the region by jeep and on foot — often at great personal peril. She interviewed dozens of people and offers a rich melange of opinions and emotions. An Algerian woman asks Miller, "I keep wondering who are these Islamic 'moderates' I keep hearing about ... there are none of these when it comes to women."

An official in the Sudan asserts, "You had better get used to it ... Islam is the future. You won't be able to stop it."

Some of her revelations include the following: President Hafez al-Assad of Syria has been on the Saudi payroll since the mid-1960s; the CIA saved Libya's Muammar Khadafi on several occasions by tipping him off to coup attempts; and Iran's President Rafsanjani personally approved several of Tehran's murderous terrorist assaults abroad.

She also indicates that the World Trade Centre bombing in 1993 in New York City was the work of Mujahideen whose arms were supplied by the United States when they were resisting the Soviets in Afghanistan.

For the most part, the author's conclusions are pessimistic. She wonders: How can fragmented and beleaguered governments deliver on their promises for a better future for their citizens? How viable are Islamic movements for change if they are not propelled by the ideas of tolerance and democratic values? How can a state compete in an increasingly ferocious global market if it denies women and non-Muslim minorities legal and constitutional equality with the Muslim male citizens? If fundamentalist ideology is so uncompromising, what are chances for Arab-Israeli reconciliation? What happens to the dream of a "New Middle East" — a region of economic and political cooperation?

Israel is fortunate that Islamic groups fighting for attention and power are unbelievably numerous and diverse. There are 175 of these in the region, 45 in Egypt alone. These internal divisions and rivalries prevent the emergence of a unified Arab voting block that has a potential of 17 seats in the Knesset. Given current demographic trends, Israel's population would reach eight million by the year 2025 — six million Jews and two million Arabs. One out of every four Israeli citizens would be Arab. Today the ratio is one in five. "In 1992, the most popular name for a baby boy born in Israel was Muhammad."

The author concludes "This book contains very few predictions, but of this I am sure: there will not be a single, unified Islamic community ... even in the unlikely event that Islamic rebels topple every quasi-secular government in the Middle East."

This is a challenging, eye-opening, insider's account of what is happening in one of the most volatile and strategically vital portions of the globe.

Some real 'athletic' events

By JORDAN MAX

Guest Voices

It's hard not to get excited about the Olympics. The pageantry, the excitement, the commercials — even a little bit of nationalism thrown in for good measure.

So it seems only appropriate to write about Jews and athletics. There is a widespread myth that Jews are not naturally athletic. The best example I can recall is one of those coffee table books I received as a bar mitzvah gift. It had a section on Jews in Sports, starting with a picture of Bobby Fisher studying a chess board. Hardly surprising. In fact, as I will demonstrate, we Jews are among the most athletic of all peoples. It's just a recognition thing. If the Olympics can have Ballroom Dancing and Beach Volleyball (check it if you don't believe me), how about:

The Passover Marathon. (Family and empty-nesters' divisions.) Never mind the wimpy 26-mile, two-hour "marathon." This is the real McCoy, a month long ultramarathon with a looming deadline. Equipped only with a vacuum cleaner and an endless supply of shmattes, contestants would be assigned a house two weeks before the Olympics started. The contest would culminate on the last day of the Olympics before the Closing Ceremonies at nightfall with a microscopic chametz inspection. Then, for bonus, the contestants would try to serve dinner to 20 people and remain awake during a three-hour seder.

The Hagbah competition. (Right- and left-handed divisions.) Those Olympic weightlifters have it easy, with evenly balanced weights and lots of training time. How about the true athlete, a Hagbah-designate, who has only two minutes to prepare, is in herring/shnapps withdrawal, has to deal with an unevenly balanced Torah, the social consequences of dropping it, and to boot, has a "trick back" from last weekend's tennis game with the teenager?

The Two-minutes-to-Shabbat Obstacle Course. Decathlon, shmecathlon. So they get to throw this and run that over a two day period. Big deal. They don't have to do it all at the same time, do they? Consider instead the two-minutes-to-candlelighting-finish-those-Shabbat preparations. Adjust the stove, pick up things off the floor, ice the cake, set light switches, make that one last phone call, set the table, all while holding the baby and avoiding tripping over the dog, in only two minutes. Now that's what I call athletics.

The Speed Davening competition. (Mumbling and non-mumbling divisions.) Equivalent to the 100-metre hurdles, except performed early in the morning before eating or coffee, with the occasional Aramaic thrown in for maximum tongue-twisting potential.

The D'Var Torah/Shul Announcements competition. (Rabbis, shul presidents and wannabees divisions.) Compared to those "other" gymnastics, these individuals employ the same mental backflips, somersaults and tumbling lines in order to make their point or keep their audiences awake. It's far more taxing and frustrating when nobody seems to remember the next day what you spent an hour discussing.

So, while you sit like a couch potato watching all of those supposed athletes competing for fame, national pride and shampoo endorsements, take some pride in your own innate talents. Maybe, just maybe, the next Olympics will add a few more of these real athletic events.

In English, the world "you" is ambigious when referring to the singular or plural grammatical form. However in Hebrew, as in Yiddish, French, Spanish and many other languages, the word "you" takes on a different form for singular or plural. In Hebrew one says atah when addressing one person and atem when addressing many. This short grammatical example raises a most interesting question with respect to this week's Torah reading, Parshah Reeh.

The opening words of the Torah reading are: "See (you, the individual Jew), I am placing before you (plural) this day a blessing and a curse." Ambiguity in English as to the intended audience is one thing, but combining singular and plural grammatical forms in one sentence is another. Why should the Torah make such a seemingly unnatural connection?

Years ago I heard an answer to this question attributed to Rabbi Yosef Dov Halevi Soloveitchik. Rabbi Soloveitchik was one of our generation's greatest Torah scholars, and was known simply as the Rav, indicative of his pre-eminence in all areas of Torah learning and his leadership of an entire generation of Jews.

Citing several other sources where the question could also be raised, the Rav stated that the Torah emphasizes here the responsibility and obligations of the individual and how his actions can affect society as a whole.

Never mind what other people are doing. The Torah tells each individual Jew: You must be mindful of your obligations, you must always be aware of your responsibilities to your fellow men. You, the individual, are not allowed to forget that our tradition demands a specific standard of personal and moral behavior.

Seen from this perspective "See (you, the individual Jew), I am placing before you (plural) this day a blessing and a curse" takes on a new meaning.

How often does a person become discouraged thinking of what value is it that I make an effort, of what meaning or consequence will it be if I work for this or that particular organization? After all, if there is no one else who comes, no one else to help and share the burden, how will the work be carried on?

The Rav said let one person see, let one Jew care, and the result will be contagious. One person's energy and enthusiasm will influence others and ultimately the result will be to involve the many.

Parshah Reeh is the last Shabbat before the beginning of the last month of the year. Rosh Chodesh Elul is traditionally the formal start of our preparation for Rosh Hashanah. As we begin to spiritually ready ourselves to stand before the Almighty, let us always remember the impact our individual efforts can have to strengthen the community.

Last month, had Paul Revere been alive and well, he might have jumped on his horse and galloped through Boston shouting, "The Yiddish are coming! The Yiddish are coming!"

The occasion was the 15th annual Summer Seminar on Jewish Genealogy, which drew nearly 650 participants to a Boston hotel from six continents. With representatives from Russia, Australia, South Africa, Israel, Europe, Brazil, Great Britain, the United States and Canada, the conference was a sort of cerebral Jewish Olympics, abuzz with news of innovative projects, sources and discoveries.

As at previous seminars, the Boston gathering featured several days of lectures, seminars, birds-of-a-feather discussion groups, excursions to libraries and archives, and touristic side trips. Besides a thick seminar binder, each participant received a copy of the large hardcover Resources for Jewish Genealogy in the Boston Area, by Warren Blatt, an indispensible aid for doing local research.

Similar guides have been produced in association with previous seminars. The classic is Genealogical Resources in the New York Metropolitan Area, edited by Estelle Guzik, which the Jewish Genealogical Society of New York published in 1989. Another major work of the genre is A Guide to Jewish Genealogical Research in Israel, by Sallyann Amdur Sack and the Israel Genealogical Society, revised in 1995. Smaller guidebooks were published for Toronto in 1993 and Washington D.C. in 1995.

Tapes of most lectures are available from seminar organizers at nominal fees. Titles include Alexander Beider on Jewish Surnames, Peter Lande on Holocaust Research, Richard Paychyk on Marriage and Migration in 19th-century Austria-Hungary, Gabriel Braunstein on Jewish Immigration to Argentina, and Jeff Cymbler on Cemeteries and Synagogues in Poland.

Marking an important seachange, the Boston gathering reflected the indisputable fact that the Jewish genealogical community has reached a significant critical mass and energy level worldwide.

"There's been an astonishing growth of interest in the field," Bob Weiss, president of the Association of Jewish Genealogical Societies, told me. "We have more than 60 societies now, growing up in places like Australia, Azerbeijan, Brazil, Sweden, Moscow and Hamburg. It's a farflung community but many of us are using the new electronic tools to communicate, organize and get information."

The Russian-Era Indexing of Poland Project (REIPP), is the brainchild of Steven Zedeck of New Hampshire and Michael Tobias of Scotland. Working with an international team of volunteers, they established a database of indices of Jewish vital records from 19th-century Poland. So far, it contains citations for about 100,000 Polish-Jewish births, marriages and deaths, most from 1868 to 1900, but it may list some two million records within a few years. Accessible through e-mail, REIPP can lead researchers to family documents or at least provide clues as to where their families once lived.

JewishGen, a site on the World Wide Web, has been visited by thousands of people from more than 50 countries in the last six months alone, says its president, Susan King of Houston. Sitting at computers in their own homes, users may consult a cornucopia of information files and databases such as the Family Finder, an index of surnames and ancestral towns being researched by more than 2,500 people worldwide. Users may participate in special-interest group discussions, receive instruction in elementary topics, even get short documents translated free into or from 16 languages. A non-profit venture, JewishGen's electronic address is [http://www.jewishgen.org/].

ShtetLinks, another new project, offers detailed online information about an expanding list of shtetls, while a separate volunteer effort has established a growing online library of Yizkor or memorial books in translation. As well, renowned genealogist Miriam Weiner announced the forthcoming publication of a lavishly illustrated and detailed travel-and-genealogy guidebook for Poland that promises to simplify the needle-in-the-haystack-type search presently required for many scattered Polish-Jewish records.

Although he did not travel to Boston, Lawrence Tapper, an archivist at the National Archives of Canada in Ottawa, sparked a lively discussion there. His article, A Call to Arms, which appeared last year in the journal Avotaynu, castigated the Jewish community at large for its neglect of genealogy and family history, and was the basis for a panel debate.

The debates, projects and discoveries are bound to continue throughout the year and no doubt will enliven next year's conference, scheduled for Paris, France, from July 14 to 17, 1997. For details, contact the Cercle de Généalogue Juive, 14 rue St-Lazare, 75009 Paris, France, or the Jewish genealogical society nearest you.

Sixty years later, he married her all over again

By SIDURA LUDWIG
CJN Staff

TORONTO —You might think that after 60 years of marriage, a wife would know everything about her husband.

"He made these and just brought them up for me. I wasn't expecting a thing," she said, smiling.

But the surprise was on both husband and wife recently, when six employees at the Baycrest Centre made the couple a second wedding in honor of their 60th anniversary.

"They said they were going to try and make us a little party, but I never thought they would make a wedding!" Ella said.

It was a wedding right out of a fairy tale. The women had prepared a veil for Ella and arranged for a bouquet of silk flowers; Danny had a black top hat. There was also a chupah. Not to mention all the guests.

"I came downstairs," Ella said, "and I saw the reporters and T.V. stations. I said, 'How come all these people came?' It was like a real big wedding."

Sixty years ago, in the midst of the Depression, extravagant weddings were practically unheard of.

"The times were pretty tough then," Ella explained. "We had a house wedding with maybe 50 or 60 people."

They didn't even have wedding pictures.

"When I saw the proofs, I said, 'If you can't do better than that, then I don't want them.' "

Regardless of the difficult times, Ella prefers to remember the good. "They were lovely parts of our life," she said.

The couple met at a mutual friend's Halloween party.

"I was very shy and he was the life of the party," Ella recalled.

Danny knew it was bashert after he first met her. "He told my girlfriend he was going to marry me."

"We're different"

And he was persistent. When Ella tragically lost her brother to a drowning two years after they had met, Danny was very supportive to her family.

"He came and stayed with us," she said. "He really helped us through that terrible time."

Originally from Montreal, the Gilberts moved to Toronto just 12 years ago. Danny was a shipper in a dress factory for 40 years, including the Depression era. Ella was a store clerk who eventually worked her way up to become a buyer.

"I love working with people," she said. "Being with people, that's what's important."

Still active in many Baycrest activities, the Gilberts appear to have always been on the go.

"When I was 65, I tried to retire," Danny said. "I tried it for six weeks and said this is not for me. So I went out to look for a job. Everyone said, 'Who's going to hire you at 65?'

"I said, 'They can't arrest me, or put me in jail. All they can do is say no.' "

The Gilberts came to Toronto when their son moved his business here. Their daughter reacted by saying, "I know a lot of children move away from their parents, but why should parents move away from their kids?"

Ella replied, "We're different."

Danny worked for his son until two years ago when he was 82, and the business went under. The Gilberts then decided to move into Baycrest.

"I was worried about who would look after him if something were to happen to me," Ella explained.

Danny gave her a devilish smile, "I told her not to worry. I'd pick up a couple of dames at Baycrest."

Ella laughed. "He's got the best sense of humor."

When asked what the key to a successful marriage is, Ella was insistent. "Communication. You have to talk to one another. Don't go to bed angry. It's all right to argue, but always make up. Most important is communication."

With that same smile, Danny responded, "Not necessarily."

A bit of humor doesn't seem to hurt either.

Young bridge players win junior world title

By SIDURA LUDWIG
CJN Staff

TORONTO – David Halasi is quick to point out that bridge is not just for bubbies and zaydes.

The 17-year-old Northern Secondary student, and bridge partner 22-year-old Ben Zeidenberg, were recently crowned junior world champions at the Alcatel Worldwide Bridge Contest.

Their score qualified them as North American over all champions, sixth in the world, and gave them the designation of life master.

"There are different designations, depending on your experience level," Halasi explained. "If you place high enough [in the competitions], then you acquire master points. You have to win against high ranking opponents ... It took us two years to get our life masters. For some people it takes quite a while."

The partners played at the Kate Buckman Bridge Studio, along with 44 other pairs. Simultaneously, around the world, hundreds of thousands of other pairs played the same hand. Twenty-one thousand people played in North America alone.

"Our game was so big, it happens once in a lifetime," Halasi said.

Each of the two came to the game on his own.

"I started playing my first year at the University of Waterloo," said Zeidenberg, who is now studying at York University. "I met someone who ran a bridge club and was involved with Junior Bridge in Canada. He took me under his wing."

Halasi's parents are both bridge players. "When I was 15, I went down with them to a tournament to watch. They were offering free lessons. I took a couple and I was hooked."

The pair met a year and a half ago at a competition, where they played together for the first time.

"We did well," said Zeidenberg, "considering we were playing for the first time."

Then, the two decided they would play together for the 1996 Junior Trials held in Miami, Fla., the first week in August. Along with teammates Mike and Daniel Nadler, Colin Lee and Barry Piafsky, the men hope to represent Canada at the 1997 World Championships in Hamilton.

Last summer, Zeidenberg and Halasi were invited to attend the first World Junior Pairs Championship in Belgium. They also attended the World Junior Bridge Camp. It was the first time North Americans were invited.

Zeidenberg is planning to hold bridge classes at the Jewish Students Federation at York for anyone wanting to learn. He's also hoping to start up a bridge club on campus.

Regardless of the professional competitions and successful placements, both Zeidenberg and Halasi maintain that their bridge involvement is just for fun.

"It's great for solving problems and spending time with the people you like," Halasi said.

"Bridge is considered the chess of cards," Zeidenberg added.

Neither plans to turn his bridge talent into a professional career. Zeidenberg is studying pure math, with the intention of going into financial math. Halasi is going into his OAC year and is interested in medicine.

For more information about the campus bridge club or lessons, call Zeidenberg at 416-512-7308.

Shabbat Celebration for psychologists

TORONTO – A Shabbat Celebration will be held here Aug. 9 for Jewish psychologists participating in the annual convention of the American Psychological Association. Toronto residents are invited to join in.

The celebration will include Jewish song, dance and storytelling. Candles will be lit and a kiddush will be recited with the traditional wine and challah.

The event will be held in the Spin Drift/Spring Song suites of the Sheraton Centre Hotel, West Queen Street (4th floor) from 6:15 to 7:30 p.m., said Dr. Michael Bernet of Brooklyn, who is sponsoring the event.

"I was attending another convention in Massachusetts last month," says Bernet, "and felt that I needed to do something special to mark the Shabbat.

"So I asked the conference management to announce a Kabbalat Shabbat and then scoured around among the little New England towns, to come up with kosher grape juice, hearth-baked bread, sea salt, candles and white tablecloths."

The celebration was a great success and gave Bernet the impetus to organize a similar celebration in Toronto – but on a much larger scale.

The celebration will be "non-denominational," with men and women invited to join the dancing circles and the singing.

Sharing Torah's beauty

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A new learning experience has come to the Toronto area.

Torah Umesorah, the umbrella organization for Orthodox education in the United States and Canada, in conjunction with Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill, has sent seven yeshivah students, two rabbis and their wives, for the first SEED learning program to be held in Canada.

For over two weeks, they have been holding classes and lectures, some for both men and women, and some for either men or women. For those who wished it, there was also chavrusa (one-on-one) learning.

Some of the topics covered have included Tisha b'Av, prayer, peace, Talmud, and the weekly Torah portion.

Rabbi Yehoshua Berinstein of Torah Umesorah told The CJN that the SEED program was started 23 years ago by Rabbi Gavriel Ginsburgh, now rosh yeshivah of Toronto's Ner Israel Yeshiva, and well-known educator and speaker Avi Shulman.

"The idea was to send young men and couples to communities in North America and all over the world for several weeks at a time. They learn with the communities, teach, and develop programs."

All the participants are volunteers, Rabbi Berinstein noted. "They want to share the beauty of Torah, that is so precious to them."

Hundreds of communities and thousands of people have benefitted from SEED, said the rabbi.

Programs are targetted at whatever level the community wants, from very basic, to advanced yeshiva-style learning, he said. "You find some at all levels sitting and studying in the same beit midrash," the rabbi said.

The contingent that came to Toronto, which included yeshivah students from Toronto and Montreal, were billeted in local homes. They were supervised by Rabbis Shmuel and Shimon Taub and their wives, from the Lakewood Yeshiva in New Jersey, who also gave classes.

Passover in Russia

TORONTO — When Torontonians Jessica Feldman and Leah Silber came to the one-year program at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem's Rothberg School for Overseas Students, they didn't anticipate that they would wind up spending Passover in Russia.

But that is exactly what happened.

Feldman, 20, and Silber, 21, described how moved they were when they found themselves singing songs from the Passover Haggadah in front of a group of elderly Yiddish-speaking Jews in Moscow.

For some of the Russian Jews, this was the first seder they were celebrating since childhood.

"For 70 years you couldn't be Jewish, and now Jews are starting to be Jewish again," said Silber. "There's a regeneration."

The two Canadians, who have been spending the year at the Hebrew University, flew from Jerusalem to Moscow in April together with four other North American students. They participated in three seders, one for local students and two for the elderly.

The North Americans were a last-minute addition to a project organized and funded this year for the first time by Hillel — the Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and the Schusterman Family Foundation to reintroduce Passover to Jewish communities around Russia and Ukraine.

The project involved some 60 Jewish students, who fanned out over the week of Passover, some travelling in vans laden with matzah, kosher wine and haggadahs. The teams reached as far as Omsk in Siberia and Ekaterinburg deep in the Ural Mountains.

"It was an incredible experience because we were able to integrate into the Jewish community and go into people's houses and see how they live," said Silber.

Jessica Feldman and Leah Silber spent Passover in Russia in a program to reintroduce Passover to the former Soviet Union.

Envoy returning to Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

Eli Yerushalmi

TORONTO — You might say that generations of rabbinic ancestors helped prepare Eli Yerushalmi for his job in the Israeli foreign service.

After all, it takes a certain degree of diplomacy and tact to ride herd over a congregation of opinionated Jews. In his family's case, they've been doing it for 500 years. One of his ancestors, his great-great-great grandfather, Rabbi Menachem Mendel of Riminov, Poland, served as a quasi-diplomat for the Jewish community when he negotiated on their behalf with the French Emperor Napoleon.

So it wasn't a complete break with tradition when Yerushalmi decided to become a diplomat instead of a rabbi.

Yerushalmi, who came to Canada in 1993 as a counsellor at the embassy in Ottawa, is returning to Israel after serving as chargé d'affaires for the past year.

He is planning to attend the Israeli National Defence College as another step in his development as a career diplomat. The move is considered a promotion and a step towards further diplomatic postings, he said.

Yerushalmi took over as temporary head of the embassy last August when Ambassador Itzhak Shelef returned to Israel.

For the 42-year-old envoy, serving in the foreign ministry has been the fulfillment of a boyhood dream. He's always had an interest in politics and he began his career as a parliamentary assistant to the National Religious Party.

From there he moved on to a position as head of the deputy foreign minister's bureau, explaining Israel's position to North Americans during the 1982 Lebanon War.

Not only was his family not too upset by his career choice, but his father was heartend by the fact his son was representing the State of Israel. After all, it never occurred to him as a youth in Poland trying to avoid anti-Semitic thugs, that his son would one day represent the independent state of the Jews.

During Yerushalmi's one-year tenure as chargé d'affaires, he has presided over a dynamic time in Canada/Israeli relations. In that span, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated, the Oslo II Agreement was signed, Israel launched Operation Grapes of Wrath against terrorists in Lebanon and the Benjamin Netanyahu was elected prime minister.

On the Canadian front, the Canada Israel Research and Development Fund was launched to help bring together entrepreneurs from both countries.

Canada/Israel relations, which have always been cordial, were made even warmer by the negotiation and execution of a free trade agreement that is bound to heighten business ties between the two countries, Yerushalmi said.

All in all it's been a pretty eventful year and one that he has enjoyed immensely. He, his wife Shuli and their three daughters have developed a strong attachment to Canada and to the warmth and strong Zionist affiliation of its Jewish population, he said.

Canadian Jews, he points out, are more strongly committed to Zionism and seem to have a stronger Jewish identity than their neighbors to the south.

As part of the itinerant life of a diplomat, Yerushalmi has held posts in Alexandria, Egypt and Houston, Texas. He spent seven of his formative years growing up in New York City, so when he was posted as consul to Houston in 1987, he was familiar with the U.S. scene.

For the subsequent three years, he and his staff presented the Israeli case to the people and leaders of Texas, Arkansas, Louisiana, Oklahoma and New Mexico.

During that time, he met then-governor Bill Clinton of Arkansas, who, thanks to guidance from his pastor, was already a strong supporter of Israel. In fact, many people in the U.S. south were supportive of Israel because of their faith in the Bible, Yerushalmi said.

Houston marked a major departure from his previous posting (1985-87) as vice-consul in Alexandria. His assignment in Alexandria was not his first visit to Egypt. As an artillery soldier during the Yom Kippur War, Yerushalmi "visited" Egypt as part of the Israeli forces that crossed the Suez Canal to cut off a large Egyptian army on its West Bank.

In Egypt, Israeli diplomats always faced a "cold peace" and spent much of their time trying to build the relationship between Israel and Egypt, he said.

After Alexandria and Houston, Yerushalmi spent three years in Israel as assistant director of the church's division of the foreign ministry. His task was to foster good relations with religious groups — particularly Christian ones — and he played a role in the negotiations that led to Israel's formal relations with the Vatican.

In 1993 he was sent to Ottawa as counsellor and in '95 he took over as chargé d'affaires.

He is satisfied with his role in enhancing Canada/Israel ties. "During the last three years, the relations went from a warm and friendly, though lacking in substance, to one that has more substance, more economic ties and trade," he said.

Peace is irreversible, monarch's Jewish advisor says

By ELIAS LEVY
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — André Azoulay, economic affairs and communications advisor to King Hassan II of Morocco, is convinced that the Israeli-Arab peace process is irreversible.

"Everything has been tried in this conflict that has lasted 50 years: wars, terrorism, exclusion, hatred ... The only scenario which has not been exhaustively explored is that of the establishment of an equitable peace ... Even those who question this, have no other sensible alternative to propose," Azoulay said.

He was speaking to an audience of some 250 people, including political personalities, diplomats, community leaders and members of the Montreal Sephardi community.

A renowned financier, Azoulay is the only Jew in any Arab country to have such an important position. He stressed the exemplary contribution of King Hassan II to Israeli-Arab rapprochement.

"That victory of reason owes a great deal to Morocco and to the remarkable vision of His Majesty King Hassan II, who, since 1958, has not hesitated to choose the path of peace and dialogue. His approach to peace was supported almost unamimously by the Moroccan people," Azoulay said.

That peace, added Azoulay, founder of Identity and Dialogue, an organization of Moroccan Jewish and Muslim intellectuals working towards Israeli-Arab reconciliation, is beginning to take shape, thanks to the determination of Moroccan Jews.

"We provided a unique example to the world. We never gave way to fatalism or despair. We were able to fiercely resist a certain number of disastrous upheavals. Our spirit of reconciliation and of openness enabled us to resist the fatality of hatred and exclusion."

For a Jew, Azoulay said, to be the personal advisor of an Arab head of state is a challenge to do one's best.

"I am not a token Jew," he said. "I was appointed to this position with the king because I believe I have the knowledge and expertise necessary to do the job. To be a Jewish minister in Canada or in France is not such an unusual occurrence. But in the Arab world of today, it is a challenge because a Jewish advisor in an Islamic country is required to perform his role flawlessly."

Yachad Shabbaton a hit with kids

MONTREAL — On a recent weekend, some 60 young adults from Montreal and Toronto converged upon the Cote St. Luc Jewish community for the third annual Yachad Shabbaton, designed to integrate kids with developmental disabilities with their non-disabled peers.

Yachad, Hebrew for together, is an organization affiliated with the National Conference of Synagogue Youth. It offers programs in which developmentally disabled young adults participate with high school and university students in a Jewish setting.

"For those in attendance and those observing this event, a great feeling of warmth and satisfaction was evident as special bonds were formed between the participants," said coordinator Nina Glick. "For some of the local students, their participation was with slight trepidation as they were not sure of how they would be able to handle this experience.

"The overwhelming feeling at the end of the Shabbaton was amazement at how much they had received from attending. They had planned to give of themselves and found out that they were being rewarded by the specialness of the occasion."

Yachad is currently recruiting new members with developmental disabilities as well as high school and university age students to act as volunteers for its ongoing programs. Yachad's regular programs serve young adults aged 16 to 35. As well Yachad will be starting a junior division this fall for individuals aged 9 to 15 years.

The next Shabbaton will take place in Toronto in the late fall.

For more information on Yachad programs or to be included on its mailing list, contact Galya Ouanounou at 416-638-6235.

Windsurfer's bronze gives Israel its third-ever medal

Special to The CJN

ATLANTA — Israeli athletes came to Atlanta with dreams of Olympic gold, but in the final week of competition, they were elated over bronze.

Last week, windsurfer Gal Friedman became the country's third athlete ever to win an Olympic medal.

"We feel he deserved that," said Miri Navo, Israel Olympic Committee spokesperson. "The delegation is very proud."

For Friedman, winning the bronze was the culmination of a "four-year dream."

The usually cocksure and self-confident Friedman seemed dazed in the aftermath of his accomplishment. "There are no words to describe this, but I feel very good. It's been a very hard road."

Friedman, two months short of his 21st birthday, won his ninth and final race last Monday, finishing the competition with 21 negative points, behind gold medalist Nikos Kaklamanakis of Greece, who had 17 points, and Argentina's Carlos Espinola, with 19.

Of the 11 scheduled races, two were cancelled due to the unpredictable weather in Savannah, Ga., which ranged from gale-force to calm.

Friedman began the last day's races in third place, but slipped to fourth after he suffered muscle cramps during the eighth sail.

"The effort was obviously too much and I strained my arm," Friedman said in an interview on Israel Television. "But I managed to relax completely before the last sail. I really wanted to pass Espinola and could have if I'd felt better, but I'm very satisfied."

In the last sail, Friedman needed to finish at least two places ahead of New Zealand's Aaron McIntosh to be certain of clinching a medal. "The pressure on me was tremendous. I felt the whole of Israel was watching me," Friedman said.

Friedman got off to an excellent start and maintained his lead throughout the race to take first place, while McIntosh finished way back in seventh place.

"I was worried only about my equipment failing, because I knew nobody could beat me in the last race," said Friedman, his trademark cockiness returning.

A resident of Karkur, Friedman began windsurfing at the age of five with the encouragement of his father and uncle. At 13, he took first place at the 13th Maccabiah Games and he has been Israeli champion for the last four years. In 1995, he was runner-up in the European championships and this year he finished second behind Kaklamanakis in the world championships in Haifa.

Olympic final

Friedman's medal comes on the heels of Israel's first two Olympic medals. At the 1992 Olympic Games in Barcelona, Yael Arad won the silver and Oren Smadja, the bronze, both in judo. Both came in fifth this time around.

Until the windsurfing win, Israeli athletes were disappointed by their overall performance in Atlanta. The only bright spot until then came when Israel's 4 x 100 relay team made it to the finals in swimming. The team finished last, in eighth place, but was still overjoyed by the achievement.

"We're proud to be the first Israeli team to be in an Olympic final," said swimmer Yoav Bruck. "It means a lot to us. When we touched the wall and saw the results, we said we could die happy."

Reaching the finals is no small feat, said Yehoshua Dekel, director general of the Israel Sports Authority, the country's governing athletic body. "They are one of the eight best in the world and that's impossible to forget."

Like Bruck, most of the athletes — some of whom came within points, inches or seconds of being medalists — remained optimistic.

One athlete who has enjoyed her lofty spot in Israel's athletic world is Yael Arad.

"I did my best," she said of her recent match. "I gave it everything I could. Even though I did not win this medal, I'm very proud of my career."

Arad, 29, is retiring after 20 years in athletics and she said she was hoping to end it with a bang.

Shooter Guy Starik made a similar analysis of his 13th place finish. "I shot well, but not well enough, I guess," he said. "I came close to the finals, only two points away. I had the feeling I could really do it."

Among the other standouts in the Israeli delegation was Gotcha Tzitzuashvili, who came in fifth in Greco-Roman wrestling. He had advanced to the semifinals, but fell out of the running for a medal after losing two matches.

The Israeli women's fencing team — Lydia Hatoel-Zuckerman, Ayelet Ohayon and Lilach Parisky — defeated the United States to secure a ninth-place finish.

In other events, pole-vaulter Danny Krasnov made it to the finals after finishing among the top 14 with a jump of 5.60 metres. Krasnov finished eighth at the Barcelona Olympics.

Lior Carmel, competing in the 500-m kayak event for women, reached the semifinal by finishing in the top eight.

Boris Polak finished 32nd in the men's 10-m air rifle competition to go with a 20th place result in the 50-m free rifle event. Teammate Guy Starik was 26th in the same competition.

Back on the high seas, the pair of Ran Shental and Nir Shental finished in 20th place in the men's 470 yachting competition while Anat Fabrikant and Shany Kedmy finished in 12th place in the women's 470 event.

Weightlifter Vacislav Ivanovsky finished 26th, tied for last, in the 99-kilogram class, while boxer Vladislav Neiman was eliminated in the flyweight (51-kg) division.

Meanwhile, Oleg Ladik of Montreal was eliminated from medal contention in wrestling's 100-kg heavyweight class when he lost a third round repechage match.

Rabbi says prayer for U.S. gymnast Strug

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

ATLANTA — At services last week, Rabbi Arthur Oleisky said a misheberach, a healing prayer, for his most famous congregant — U.S. gymnast Kerri Strug.

Strug, 18, tore two ligaments in her ankle while leading the American gymnastics team to a first-ever gold medal at the Atlanta Games.

Strug was the youngest Olympian in Barcelona in 1992.

The rabbi said he was moved by Strug's allusions to spirituality. "I saw her on the morning talk shows after her event and she said she prayed to God for strength," said Rabbi Oleisky, the head rabbi at the Conservative Anshei Israel Congregation in Tucson, Ariz., where the Strugs have been members since 1988.

Strug, who weighs only 80 pounds, landed her second vault and winced as she stuck a painful landing that took her out of the all-round finals but assured a gold medal to the U.S. team.

Strug plans to attend college at UCLA next year — on a gymnastics scholarship, of course.

MiAs believed to be dead

Jerusalem Post Staff

JERUSALEM – Yehuda Katz, Zvi Feldman and Zacharia Baumel, the three soldiers who went missing in the 1982 battle of Sultan Ya'acoub in south Lebanon, are believed to be buried in Syria, security sources said last week.

The three soldiers, members of a tank crew, were previously believed to have been killed and buried somewhere in Lebanon.

"All the information available to Israel indicates that the three are buried in Syria," one security source said. He did not elaborate.

Israel Radio quoted a senior Palestinian source as saying that their bodies had been taken by ambulance from Sultan Ya'acoub to a Palestinian cemetery in Syria. The source, who quoted three Fatah activists who claimed to have taken the bodies, said the Syrians were not aware that the dead were Israeli soldiers.

A spokesperson for Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said he was checking the report.

Labor party leader Shimon Peres told Israel Radio that the information was neither new nor definite.

"We are speaking in essence of a place on the Syrian border, within Syrian territory, so in the end a lot depends on the Syrians," Peres said. "Look, there is a distance between an assessment and definitive information."

The radio quoted the Palestinian source as saying that the information came from three former gunmen, now living in Jordan, who had said they buried the three soldiers under Palestinian names without letting the Syrians know.

The report said U.S. efforts to secure the return of the bodies were undermined by Operation Grapes of Wrath.

Family members of the MiAs met recently with OC Manpower Maj.-Gen. Gideon Shefer. They expressed disappointment after the meeting, saying that they had not received any new information, and that they had apparently been called to the meeting because of media reports.

"There was nothing specific. They told us they are working on things, but we have been hearing that for a long time," said Yona Baumel, Zacharia's father.

Feldman's sister, Anat Cohen, said their expectations had been aroused because of the haste with which they were called to the meeting.

"For the past 14 years, there have been reports. Some say there are bodies and others that the boys are alive ... We have differences of opinion with the establishment, which believes that they must look for bodies, while we believe our boys are alive," she said.

How the soldiers were lost

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – On June 11, 1982, the fifth day of the Lebanon War, Israeli tanks engaged the Syrians at Sultan Ya'acoub, a Christian-Druze town in the Bekaa Valley. It turned out to be a death trap.

Lacking updated intelligence and exhausted from 24 hours of constant battle, an armored battalion made up of hesder yeshivah students found themselves scattered in the valley, as Syrian gunners and the 1st Division, freshly arrived from Damascus, began picking them off one by one from the ridges.

Feeling abandoned, the commander ordered his troops to hunker down and make a mad dash out of the valley.

Seven tanks were left behind and one disappeared. At least two soldiers from one tank were captured. Sgt. Hezi Shai was held by the PFLO-GC and returned in May 1985 and Sgt. Ariel Lieberman was held by the Syrians and returned on June 28, 1984.

Two other crew members, Staff-Sgt. Zvi Feldman and Staff-Sgt. Zacharia Baumel were never heard from again and declared missing in action.

A second tank was under the command of Capt. Zohar Lipshitz, who was killed in the battle and buried on July 4, 1982 in the Jewish cemetery of Damascus. His remains were returned here two years later.

Cpl. Yehuda Katz and two other soldiers were also in the tank. The two made it back safely to Israeli forces, but Katz went missing.

Since then, the Baumel, Feldman and Katz families have been searching for their sons. They have met with U.S. presidents and other world leaders and even travelled to Arab countries seeking information. Two years ago, PLO chairman Yasser Arafat gave Israel half of Baumel's dog tag, promising more information.

Arafat's nightmare

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

The ascendancy of a right-wing government in Israel has demoralized the Palestinians.

Mideast Analysis

Yasser Arafat, leader of the PLO and president of the Palestine Authority, was aware that Israel's May 29 election would be close. But he assumed that Shimon Peres and the Labor party — which forged Israel's historic rapprochement with the PLO nearly three years ago — would be re-elected.

The Palestinians counted on a Labor party victory because it was a known quantity, favoring territorial compromise and not averse to a Palestinian state.

True, Arafat's relationship with the former Israeli government was less than cordial at times, particularly after a gruesome suicide bombing, the bane of the Oslo peace process.

But for Arafat, the Labor party promised a measure of continuity, while the Likud, with Benjamin Netantanyu at its helm, offered uncertainty at best.

With Netanyahu's ascension to power, Arafat's worst nightmare has materialized. He faces a government which rejects the land-for-peace formula, which is profoundly uncomfortable with the Oslo framework, which is adamantly opposed to a Palestinian state, which intends to expand Jewish settlements and build new roads in the territories, and which threatens to pursue terrorists into Palestinian self-rule areas.

Furthermore, Netanyahu has declared that he will not press ahead with peace unless the Palestine Authority succeeds in curbing terrorism. "It's either terrorism or peace," Netanyahu has said.

By contrast, Peres and his predecessor, Yitzhak Rabin, pushed Arafat hard to crack down on terrorism, perpetrated in the main by Islamic fundamentalist groups. Nevertheless, they believed that the peace process — which is supported by a considerable majority of Israelis — should not be held hostage by terrorism.

While Rabin and Peres established working relations with Arafat, Netanyahu has avoided him like the plague.

In the wake of the election, Netanyahu personally called King Hussein of Jordan and President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt, but snubbed Arafat, whom he considers a terrorist. And in his first post-election speech, Netanyahu compounded the insult by not even mentioning Arafat, much less the PLO.

In keeping with his pledge to negotiate with the Palestine Authority, Netanyahu has delegated Dore Gold, his foreign affairs advisor, to open channels of communication with the Palestinian leadership. And more recently, Netanyahu acquiesced to a meeting between Foreign Affairs Minister David Levy and Arafat.

Netanyahu himself, however, remains resistant to a face-to-face encounter with Arafat, saying he will reassess his position only if it is in Israel's national interest. Netanyahu's attitude is anything but universally popular within the Likud. Ronni Milo, the Likud mayor of Tel Aviv, has warned that if Netanyahu is serious about making peace with the Palestinians, he must meet with Arafat sooner or later.

But Netanyahu's personal aversion to Arafat is probably the least of the Palestinians' problems with the new government.

To the Palestine Authority, the first acid test of Netanyahu's sincerity to honor solemn commitments is Hebron, from which Israel is obliged to withdraw. Netanyahu is still "studying" the issue.

Meanwhile, the Palestinians are waiting to see if Netanyahu makes good on his campaign pledges to remove Jerusalem from final status talks and to close Orient House, the PLO's unofficial headquarters in Jerusalem. The PLO's senior official in Jerusalem, Faisal Husseini, has warned that such moves will be viewed as a "declaration of war" and as a sign that peace negotiations are at an end.

With respect to Jerusalem, the Palestinians are also concerned by Netanyahu's statements about the Temple Mount. In contravention of Israeli policy since the Six Day War, he has said that Jews should be allowed to pray there. Yet he claims that he has no intention of changing the status quo on the Temple Mount.

Further tension is caused by Netanyahu's claim that the PLO has not really amended its national covenant and by the Palestinians' belief that Israel has reneged on agreements to release more prisoners and to implement an accord on a safe passage between the Gaza Strip and the West Bank.

Be that as it may, the situation is not entirely gloomy. Netanyahu has eased the blockade of the territories by allowing more Palestinian day workers to enter Israel. And he is skeptical about the idea of "separation," championed by his predecessors to combat terrorism.

Just as significantly, Netanyahu appears favorably disposed to a continuation of U.S. aid to the Palestine Authority, provided the Palestinians comply fully with the provisions of the Oslo accords.

He realizes that economic misery can only inflame Palestinian grievances and encourage terrorism.

July 30

• Israeli security forces, aided by information from the Palestinians, uncovered in southern Israel what they believe are the remains of an Israeli soldier kidnapped and killed by Hamas terrorists in 1989. Palestinian security forces had travelled to Arab states, located the two terrorists who murdered Ilan Saadon and obtained information on the whereabouts of his body, Israel Radio reported.

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met on Monday with leaders of the Council of Judea, Samaria and Gaza, Ha'aretz reported. Following the meeting, Netanyahu said, "Settlements in Judea, Samaria and Gaza must be allowed to develop like any Israeli settlement, without discrimination."

July 31

• Thousands of travellers were stranded for hours, as Ben-Gurion Airport workers called a strike to protest privatization. The employees returned to work after Histadrut chair Amir Peretz spoke to Transportation Minister Yitzhak Levy, and was assured that no structural or organizational changes would be made without consulting workers.

Aug. 1

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and President Ezer Weizman have agreed in principle to extend presidential terms from five to seven years, Israel Radio, Kol Yisrael, reported. The amendment would go into effect beginning with Weizman's current tenure. If approved, the proposal would extend Weizman's tenure from 1998 until 2000.

Zundel, Priebke get favorable court rulings

In light of those statements, the judge went on, "there is a reasonable apprehension of bias of SIRC towards Zundel ... [and] a prejudgment of issues before SIRC."

Heald emphasized that his decision did not focus on the question of whether Zundel was indeed a security risk to Canada. "I freely acknowledge that, as a consequence of this decision, the legislative scheme envisaged by the Citizenship Act and the CSIS Act will have been thwarted with respect to Zundel's citizenship application. Perhaps ... the question of an effective remedy can only be addressed through creative legislative action."

Zundel's latest encounter with the Canadian legal system began after he applied for Canadian citizenship in 1993.The Ministry of Citizenship referred his case to the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), which reported that Zundel was a security risk. Zundel challenged that finding, and the review of CSIS' finding was taken to SIRC. Zundel's lawyer, Doug Christie, challenged that procedure, alleging bias and he asked the Federal Court to prohibit the SIRC review.

Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Bernie Farber urged the federal government "to look at all the options available as expediently as possible to get this matter dealt with."

Farber, who had testified as a witness against Zundel at the SIRC hearings, called the court decision "a minor legalistic setback." The government's decision to withhold citizenship from Zundel still stands and the court decision only dealt with the ability of SIRC to hear the case, he said.

John Oliver, a spokesperson for Immigration Minister Lucienne Robillard, said the ministry is considering an appeal or perhaps amending the legislation.

Zundel, who has lived in Canada since 1958 and has become one of the world's pre-eminent distributors of Holocaust-denial literature, said he would reapply for Canadian citizenship.

B'nai Brith Canada called on federal authorities to appeal the court decision and to withhold citizenship. "His teachings are cancerous to the multicultural fabric of Canada," it said in a news release.

Meanwhile in Italy, cries of "fascist" and "shame" erupted in the courtroom in the wake of the decision freeing Priebke. Judge Agostino Quistelli ruled that Priebke was just following orders in participating in the country's worst wartime massacre.

Sol Littman, spokesperson for the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, said he has asked Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy to "exert every effort to persuade the Italian government to extradite Priebke back to Germany."

In condemning "the sadness of the courts," Littman said Priebke "was the officer in charge of all the executions. He checked the names off a board as they went through. He even showed his men how to do it."

The Italian military court that heard the case was "reluctant to punish anyone who said they were just following orders," Littman said, and he speculated it might still be influenced by the old fascist ideology.

He discounted the defence claim that Priebke would have been shot for disobeying orders, saying no one was shot for refusing to participate in massacres. He also pointed out that the Nuremberg tribunals dismissed the defence of following orders.

Yeshiva destroyed

MOSCOW – One of the city's leading Jewish facilities, the Mekor Chayim, or Source of Life Yeshiva, was completely destroyed last month by a fire on July 12.

The fire was believed to have been caused by an electrical short circuit.

Destroyed in the blaze were 5,000 volumes of Russia's largest open Jewish library, the largest kosher commissary in Moscow, hundred of religious items, classrooms and offices. As long as weather permits, students are continuing their learning in the open air outside the ruined premises.

"It's a tragic day for Russian Jews," said Moscow Chief Rabbi Pinchas Goldschmidt. The Jewish community "has lost the biggest open Judaica library" in the former Soviet Union, he added.

The centre is popularly known as the Steinsaltz Yeshiva after its head, Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz, Talmudic scholar and translator who has served as Russia's spiritual leader since 1995.

For more information on how you can help the Steinsaltz Yeshiva, contact the Aleph Society Emergency Russian Renewal Fund, 25 West 45th St., New York, N.Y. 10036.

JERUSALEM — Retired generals blasted the London publication Jane's World Airforces for disclosing revelations about the Israel Air Force (IAF), saying the information would help Arab armies.

The latest edition of the publication details the number of aircraft, names and locations of squadrons and inventories of weapons.

"This is unbelievable," former OC Air Force Avihu Bin-Nun said. "The bottom line is that this causes very grave damage."

According to the report, Israel has at least 699 aircraft, including 243 F-16s and 72 F-15s. The IAF also has two squadrons of Jericho Intermediate Range Ballistic Missiles (IRBMs) located at the Sdot Micha air base near Lod. The report also listed the number, location, name and function of each IAF squadron at 11 air bases around the country.

Even though the report was published last March, it wasn't noticed in Israel until Yediot Aharonot military analyst Alex Fishman reported on it last week, sending shock waves through the military. Fishman said none of the senior commanders he spoke to had seen the report before.

Bin-Nun said that as far as he knows, there is no such comprehensive document in IAF hands. He said enemy states could use the information to fill in intelligence gaps.

"Another level on which harm has been caused involves a case in which a pilot is taken captive [and] this document can serve his captors and guide their interrogation," he told Israel Radio.

Retired brigadier-general Oded Erez told Israel Radio that not all of Jane's information is correct and that most of it has been published abroad before, "but there has never been such a concentration as this before.

"This information is the fruit of tedious work done over years and derived from many sources. It could very well be that the enemy intelligence ... can use this publication in order to justify gaining special funding for building forces, since we are posing this kind of threat," Erez said.

It would be naive to believe Israel is immune to this sort of exposure, Erez said, "but it is very important that field security was not diligent and we have to be more strict about this. There is a price for the public's right to know," he added.

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai told the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee the details on the IAF revealed in the British journal "had caused harm, some of it even serious harm."

Mordechai told the Knesset Foreign Affairs Committee, "Any type of leak causes harm. I strongly protest the way some people allow themselves a loose tongue. I've ordered an investigation into the case, whether or not it stems from elements under our control. I will take the fullest action against any one of us who is found guilty. I wish we were less chatterboxes."

Mordechai also answered several questions about the discovery of the body believed to be that of kidnapped soldier Ilan Sa'adon and about other MiAs.

According to an official briefing, Mordechai said in the past month four searches have been made for the victims of the submarine Dakar, missing since 1968 and presumed sunk.

"We will continue the search," Mordechai reportedly said, adding, "we will also continue the search for the 18 MiAs from the Yom Kippur War on Egyptian soil."

According to Mordechai, the Palestinian Authority's (PA) intelligence service should be praised for its cooperation, but he qualified this, saying, "We are very concerned by the large-scale release of terrorists by the PA, some of whom return to terror activities."

Israel supports wording

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – American officials believe that Israel's support for the wording of a UN nuclear test ban treaty could help secure the backing of other Middle Eastern countries.

Foreign Minister David Levy last week informed John Holum, the visiting director of the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, that Israel had decided to support the text of the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty.

Holum said he believed that Israel's backing was "very important in securing regional support." He added he hopes that Egypt will also support the treaty.

Negotiations hammering out the final language of the treaty, which calls for a complete ban on all nuclear testing, took place this week in Geneva.

While Levy accepted the wording of the treaty, he asked that an appendix be added to prevent it from being exploited by some countries, causing them to demand international checks of Israel's nuclear facilities.

Israel, which refuses to confirm or deny its possession of nuclear weapons, has resisted pressure applied by a number of countries, including Egypt, to sign the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Dover Pad specializes in made-to-measure covers

Custom-made table pads are functional and esthetic.

It was a tall order but the Dover Pad division of Dover Finishing Products met the challenge.

The place was a stately conference room of a sophisticated corporate concern. The order was a made-to-measure pad to top a conference table (23 ft. long, 8 ft. wide) shaped like a boat. Moreover, Dover Pad made provisions for 8 individual cutouts to allow wires to pass through the table for headphones.

General manager Bill Booth admits this was an extraordinary challenge, but added, "We treat each request as special. Physically, our staff will take pattern paper, attach it to the table and from a tracing cut the pad. The curvature of one table could differ slightly from another. Table pads must be fitted within 1/16th of an inch. Every one of our pads is made to measure regardless of the size or shape of the table."

Made-to-measure, heat-resistant (600°F) pads are available in 16 colours. "Shades range from off-white or black to wood grain tones," says Booth.

For the conventional dining room table, there is 1 pad for each half of the table as well as 1 piece for each extension leaf. Clients have the choice of 2 different grades, 1 with felt on the underside, the other an ultra-elite model with velor on the underside. The vinyl top of both is water resistant. The ultra-elite pad comes with a 20-year guarantee.

A durable investment to protect wood, glass, granite and other fine finishes, Dover table pads soften the noise of crystal and provide a smooth surface for dinnerware and cutlery.

Formerly the inner material consisted of laminates of cardboard. This was subject to humidity and with age could flop and soften. Now the inner material consists of a medium density fibreboard that is unique in the industry.

"We're the only ones with this exclusive material," Booth says. "Another improvement involves the attaching system. Before, it was customary to use a metal or plastic clip to attach pads to prevent slippage. Now we insert velcro along the joints on the inside edges."

Modern Dover pads are substantially lighter, allowing the host to set an extended dining room table for Shabbat or simchahs without help. With Rosh Hashanah in mind, Dover Pad offers a 15% discount on table pads ordered before August 19. It takes 4-6 weeks for delivery.

Dover Pad provides home services without obligation throughout Metropolitan Toronto and Calgary (1-800-354-4445) or in Montreal (514-748-8684.)

Hundreds Join Jewish Singles Registry . . . Risk Free

At the Jewish Singles Registry we know how hard it is to meet interesting people. Your job takes up a lot of time, you're not one for the bar scene, and while classifieds are great for selling cars, they are not ideal for meeting a partner. This is where our organization comes in. We're here to make dating fun and exciting, the way it should be.

What makes the J.S.R. so successful is our concept of allowing singles to select for themselves who they would like to go out with. By reviewing detailed and comprehensive biography profiles on each member, including photographs, members are provided with a clear "picture" of what their potential partner is all about. The J.S.R. process is very much a two way street. Members are given the freedom to be the selector, the selectee, or both. Once both parties give mutual consent, phone numbers are then exchanged. This system enables members to make informed and quality dating choices, without relying on others to decide for them. There is no matchmaking here.

Risk Free Service

What sets J.S.R. apart from all other such services is that you can join virtually Risk Free. Members get to go on as many dates as they wish throughout the year (providing both individuals have said yes), and are Guaranteed a minimum of 10 dates within the first year of their membership or they stay in the service for free. Call the J.S.R. office for more details.

An Engagement Every Six Weeks

The J.S.R. concept has been so successful that the service is averaging an engagement every six weeks. Hundreds of dates are arranged monthly, with thousands of selections made each year. With new members joining on practically a daily basis these figures are expected to rise even higher in the days and weeks ahead.

Open Six Days A Week

Another important factor which J.S.R. members benefit from are long office hours. Our office is open six days a week, including evening hours and Sundays. A professional and dedicated staff ensures that J.S.R. members are well taken care of on each visit. Members can make appointments as many times as they wish, and may choose as many people as they would like, throughout the year. Most new J.S.R. members are usually dating within one week of joining the service.

Jewish Continuity Is Our Business

With intermarriage still on the rise, J.S.R. accepts the challenge of being Toronto's number one Jewish dating service and continues to play a large role in the Toronto Jewish community. Whether you are looking to meet someone for friendship, a relationship, or even marriage, now is the time to sign up with the Jewish Singles Registry of Toronto. Call us today at (416) 398-7068.

New Chance dating service targets young clientele

By SIDURA LUDWIG
CJN Staff

TORONTO – The managers of the dating service, A New Chance, want to give Jewish singles just that.

"We think it's important for Jews to marry Jews. Or at least have the opportunity," said Kira Khentov, 26, one of three women who run the service.

When she and her partners, Julie Krass and Juliet Wintrobe, both 25, graduated from post-secondary education, they saw a need for an outlet for Jewish singles to meet.

"We hear a lot of complaints from people out of university on how hard it is to meet Jews," Khentov said. "If you're in the workplace, you could be the only Jew in your company."

"We wanted to beat the recession," Wintrobe said. "This is a good cause, and it's something we have some knowledge about."

The three women had been pairing up their friends for years. And once they decided they wanted to start a service, they took the time to research other dating businesses.

"Other dating services are run by 40-year-olds, 35 at the youngest," said Khentov. "They don't have the connection with the youth. A woman at 50 is going to look for different qualities in a man than a woman in her 20s."

Wintrobe added, "We're young, we're single. We can identify with what young adults want."

A New Chance started about five months ago, and caters to Russian and Canadian Jews (both Khentov and Krass are fluent in Russian). It has two offices, one at Bathurst and Wilson, and one at Bathurst and Finch. Their clientele are mainly ages 20 to 40. The women, while maintaining that they serve all ages, would like to start targeting a younger audience.

Beyond matching their clients for one-to-one dates, the women plan social interactive functions. Their business is associated with Mark and Ari party services, and recently, the two services held a joint dance for members and non-members.

"Mark and Ari have a loyal and large clientele, with members mainly in their late 20s," said Khentov.

But the women don't want to limit their functions to dances.

"At dances, there's lots of music, it's dark, you're with your own friends. It's difficult to interact," said Wintrobe. "We want to try something with more opportunity for people to meet each other."

Soon, Wintrobe and Khentov will travel to Europe with the intention of starting up a Jewish singles' European tour.

"Everyone loves to travel," Khentov said. "There are a lot of shared experiences ... Europe is a social as well as a historical trip."

A New Chance guarantees a minimum of three introductions. After the first date, clients are requested to report back to the service.

Clients are asked to provide two current pictures, one head shot, one full body. As well, in an interview with two of the three partners, an extensive biography is put together.

"We want our clients to be specific with their interests," said Wintrobe. "Not just that they like music, sports and movies, but what kind."

Clients are also asked to bring in two pieces of ID, one with a picture and address.

The women have begun to expand their business and now have clients in Montreal and Ottawa. They are considering use of the Internet.

Cuban business may cost Israeli firm

By MATTHEW DORG
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON – Top executives and major shareholders in the Israeli agribusiness company BM may be barred from entering the U.S.

The firm is slated to be formally notified that it is in violation of the Helms-Burton Act, which imposes sanctions on foreign firms profiting from assets seized from U.S. citizens and companies after the 1959 Cuban revolution. U.S. officials claim BM is financing sugar crops on land formerly owned by Americans.

There is currently a reprieve on enforcement of the act until January 1997.

Travel Talk

BUSTLING, HISTORIC BOSTON

Twenty years ago, during the American bicentennial summer, the billowing white sails of a fleet of tall ships dominated Boston harbor, and an ambitious redevelopment project in that city's downtown captured the attention and applause of city planners around the world.

For the previous 150 years, Faneuil Hall Marketplace had consisted of three long rows of stalls and warehouses, which were home to a lively throng of merchants, fishermen, butchers and produce sellers. But the buildings, vacated a decade earlier with the departure of the food wholesalers, had become derelict.

The area has a rich colonial history. It was here that Samuel Adams had rallied Bostonians to the cause of independence from the British, and it was here that George Washington had toasted the nation on its first birthday. Thus, the revival of Faneuil Hall, amidst much hoopla and fireworks and flag-waving in 1976, was regarded as nothing less than the simultaneous restoration of both a neighborhood marketplace and a national icon.

Today the Faneuil Hall Marketplace, with its colorful mix of shops, restaurants, street performers and late-night pubs, is perhaps Boston's foremost attraction for visitors. The market is situated along Boston's famous Freedom Trail, which consists of 16 numbered historical sights. They include the Paul Revere House, the birthplace of Benjamin Franklin, and the Old Corner Bookstore, built in 1712, where such greats as Longfellow, Emerson, Hawthorne and Thoreau used to meet.

Easily accessible by public transport, the Boston Museum of Fine Arts is considered one of America's great museums. On display until Sept. 15 is a major exhibition of the works of the French impressionist Paul Gauguin. Also well worth seeing is the collection of about 200 photographic portraits by the renowned Ottawa photographer, Yousuf Karsh (until Oct. 20.)

A wonderful way to see the city, especially if you're short on time, is via one of the commercial tour buses such as Old Town Trolley Tours. Old Town's vehicles do a full circuit of 19 sites around town in two hours; sightseers may get on and off as they please, until they have returned to their starting point.

Dramatic exhibits

Visitors may also enjoy seeing the new museum at the John F. Kennedy Library. In a striking I.M. Pei building overlooking the waterfront, the museum re-creates the world of the JFK presidency in a series of 25 dramatic exhibits, three theaters and 20 video presentations.

In Boston, I stayed at the Bostonian Hotel, a small luxury hotel adjacent to Faneuil Hall, as a guest of the Greater Boston Convention & Visitors Bureau.

Israel Bank lowers rate

Jerusalem Post Staff

JERUSALEM – The Bank of Israel trimmed its key lending rate by 70 basis points to 16.3 percent last week citing increasing indications of stabilizing money supply and reduced inflationary expectations.

The interest rate reduction, the first after eight months of a steadfast and highly contentious tight-money policy led by Governor Jacob Frenkel, was met with mixed feelings among Frenkel's rivals, and welcomed by Tel Aviv's financial markets.

Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu said the cut reflected indications that the battle against inflation is bearing fruit. Netanyahu dismissed demands by various business circles that Frenkel's recently approved appointment for a second five-year term be reconsidered, and said he has "full faith" in Frenkel.

There is a good chance now that inflation for the remainder of this year will be lower than the 15 percent annual rate that prevailed so far this year.

HATH NOT A JEW...

The excellent production of The Merchant of Venice, now in performance at the Stratford Festival, does not diminish the fact that this is one of Shakespeare's more problematic and star-crossed plays.

The most important thing to bear in mind when seeing this play is that Shakespeare had likely never seen a Jew when he wrote it about 1605. The Jews had been expelled from England in 1290 and were not officially permitted to return until 1648 or thereabouts.

Nonetheless, Britain's Bard had certainly heard of Rodrigo Lopez, the Sephardi Jew who served as Queen Elizabeth's personal physician. Several years before Shakespeare invented the rapacious and rancorous Shylock, Lopez – an Elizabethan Dreyfuss – was falsely convicted of treason and executed. Some years earlier, Shakespeare might also have heard of Joachim Gaunz, a mining expert from Prague who let slip a few words of Hebrew while working in Bristol, for which he was branded as a Jew and deported.

Henry Irving, as Shylock in 1879 gave the theatre its most famous and sympathetic portrayal of Shakespeare's infamous villain.

Shakespeare also knew of Christopher Marlowe, the contemporaneous playwright whose earlier caricature of a Jew in The Jew of Malta, according to literary critic A.M. Klein, was "a monster by the name of Barabbas (note the reprehensible reference) who incarnated all the vices then known to civilization." Like Barabbas, Shylock is malevolent and demonic, and seems to lack even a single redemptive quality.

While Shakespeare permits his odious money-lender to plead for sympathy with the famous "Hath not a Jew ..." soliloquy, it is largely ineffective. Shylock wants to extract a pound of flesh from the merchant Antonio, who has defaulted on a loan after his ships were lost at sea. In his single-minded mania for revenge, Shylock seems a vile economic counterpart to the Jews of the medieval stereotype whose recipe for matzah supposedly calls for the blood of Christian babies.

Just as Shakespeare had likely never encountered a Jew, he had never set foot in Italy and knew little of the ways of Venetian shipping merchants who had been insuring their cargoes for generations. But he well understood the popular prejudices of Elizabethan audiences and craftily exploited their endemic anti-Semitism to increase the box-office appeal of his plays. Evidently, it mattered not that usury was as commonplace in Italy then as it was in England, where the standard legal rate of interest was 10 per cent.

The Merchant of Venice was written hurriedly to meet popular demand, without a thought to posterity. Were it written by anyone else, Shylock would be as little known today as Marlowe's Jewish monster or the equally vile stereotypes invoked centuries earlier by Geoffrey Chaucer.

The current Stratford production alludes subtly through costume and mannerisms to fascist Italy in the 1930s, but otherwise allows playgoers to make of Shylock what they will. The program offers no preparatory comment or tempering advice: audience members are presumed to be wise enough to know anti-Semitism when they see it.

Is The Merchant of Venice a play best left on the shelf? Marti Maraden, director of the current production said this question has been debated at length at Stratford, with some concluding that the play is inherently anti-Semitic and others that it merely attempts to deal, rather ineptly, with the issue of anti-Semitism.

"My reading of the play was that it contained virulent anti-Semitism but that it needn't be anti-Semitic if we went about it the right way," she said.

"Since Shylock is the most sensitive role, I thought that the best thing I could do was to cast the best actor I know in the part, so it went to Douglas Rain. I knew that he would bring out the humanity of Shylock, the good as well as the bad."

Did Rain succeed in doing so? Methinks not, but the fault lies less in any member of the fine cast than in the poisoned inkwell in which Shakespeare dipped his otherwise benevolent and mighty pen.

If you've a mind to do so, go judge for yourself. The Merchant of Venice, with Susan Coyne as Portia, continues at Stratford's Avon Theatre until Nov. 3.

New medical technique counters male infertility

By WENDY ELLIMAN
Jerusalem Dateline

JERUSALEM, Israel — Around 10 percent of all couples who want children in the Western world are infertile. In almost half of them, this is because of problems associated with the production or delivery of sperm.

"Despite this, almost all infertility research has focused on women," says Prof. Neri Laufer, head of the Department of Gynecology and Obstetrics at the Hebrew University-Hadassah Medical Centre on Mount Scopus, and chair of the Israel Fertility Society. "Knowledge about male infertility is still rudimentary, which makes the techniques we've introduced in Israel very important."

Nature is so extravagantly excessive in producing sperm (there are as many as 300 million of them in the teaspoon of ejaculate expelled during each sexual climax), that there would seem to be little problem in at least some getting through to the egg. But even in fertile men, no more than 50 of the hundreds of millions of sperm in each ejaculate ever reach the egg. Very large quantities of perfectly formed sperm are thus essential.

Sperm, however, can become non-viable for a wide range of reasons. "Environmental conditions can damage sperm production: overcrowding, stress, alcoholism, smoking, chemical pollution, radiation and poor nutrition are some of them," says Laufer. "Congenital abnormalities also damage male fertility. Cystic fibrosis is among these: one of its non-pulmonary aspects is lack of exit vessels from the man's testicles. And infection can be a third cause: infections of the sexual organs, venereal disease, prostatitis, epididymitis and, of course, mumps."

The harm done to male fertility by all this, however, can now be countered by a technique developed three years ago in Belgium and extended and developed at Hadassah.

"The technique is known as Intra Cytoplasm Sperm Injection (ICSI)," says Laufer. "It involves drawing sperm cells out of the ejaculate and injecting them directly into the ovum or egg, sparing them the long difficult journey up into the fallopian tube. All we need to succeed are a few normal sperm cells, which need not even be mobile."

To this Belgian method, Laufer and his team had added their own expertise in in vitro fertilization. "Since 1988, we've been working on micromanipulative techniques of uniting sperm with egg," he says. "Together with Prof. Aaron Lewis of Hadassah's Laser Department, we've created a laser that can drill a microscopic hole into an ovum — the ovum itself, remember, is no bigger than a grain of sand — without damaging any of the surrounding structures. In doing this, we not only spare the sperm cell the trouble of breaking through the egg's 'shell,' but also significantly improve chances of the embryo hatching."

Some 20 couples have become pregnant at Hadassah with ICSI followed by micromanipulation, among them several for whom religion and culture ruled out donor insemination as an option.

Laufer and his team are also using ICSI in men who have no sperm at all in their ejaculate. These patients fail to ejaculate sperm because of a blockage somewhere along the line, in or around the epididymis which stores mature sperm, or in the vas deferens, the duct through which the sperm exit.

"First we perform microsurgery on the epididymis, under very high magnification," says Laufer. "The epididymis resembles a 20-foot strand of human hair, coiled at the side of the testicle, and it's here the sperm cells flow from the testis to mature. Our aim is to find the obstruction along its coils, get the sperm clustered behind the blockage, and extract them."

Two of seven couples in whom there were no apparent sperm production have become pregnant following this procedure. In one, the husband is a cystic fibrosis carrier and has no exit tubes for his sperm. He lay anesthetized in one operating room during his epididymal aspiration. His wife was prepared in another. When viable sperm cells were found, Laufer extracted her ova for in vitro fertilization. A normal pregnancy followed this unconventional start, and the couple are now the happy parents of a little girl.

Even patients who appear to have no sperm production at all now have a chance of biologically fathering children. "We've found that in a majority of such patients, we're able to find an essential few sperm cells," says Laufer. "We biopsy the testicle, remove a tiny slice of testis and extract any sperm we find there. Fertilization is then performed by ICSI."

Labor dispute launched

By MICHAL YUDELMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Histadrut declared a labor dispute last week that encompasses 250,000 workers in the public sector, as prelude to a general strike against the government's privatization plans.

The labor dispute includes the Finance, Defence, Health, Housing, Agriculture and Communications ministries, local authorities, hospitals, Airports Authority, Ports and Railways Authority, Postal Authority, Israel Industries, Israel Electric Corporation, Bezeq, Mekorot and others.

The labor dispute enables any or all of these workplaces to impose sanctions, hold protest meetings and take other measures, including a full strike, after 14 days.

Such measures will be implemented immediately if any minister announces his intention to privatize or make structural economic changes without consulting and coordinating with the Histadrut, said Histadrut chair Amir Peretz.

"In two weeks, all the workers in the government ministries, corporations and authorities will be organized and legally prepared to take any steps including a strike," Peretz said.

"If a minister announces his intention to privatize, if the Knesset decides to do so, or if the cabinet decides to pass legislation in the Knesset to this effect; if the government makes any decision about changing the structure of the economic bodies — the workers will spring into action."

The hospital nurses intend to go on strike immediately after the two-week cooling-off period, their union leader Ilana Cohen said yesterday, unless Health Minister Tzahi Hanegbi cancels his plans to privatize three state hospitals.

The labor dispute at El Al was postponed by two weeks

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

I'm a senior who offers my time as a volunteer driver for the community agency in my city. I accompany frail seniors to their doctor's appointments. I find that it is not uncommon for patients to wait an hour or even two for their appointment. I think that this is unacceptable, but am not sure what to do about it. Do you have any suggestions?

Godot (As in "Waiting For")

Dear Waiting for Godot,

You are quite right, waiting for one to two hours is disrespectful and unacceptable. Your time is as valuable as theirs and it's important that your grievance be voiced and heard. If people make enough of an issue about extended waiting periods, the system will have to respond. The way you go about being heard is important, for example blowing your top at the medical receptionist is unlikely to better the situation. Depending on the setting, this is what I suggest:

If you have been made to wait at a clinic, I suggest you speak to the doctor and to the administerator of the clinic. If they do not give you a satisfactory response, you might want to speak to a senior manager in the organization.

If you have been made to wait at a doctor's personal office, I suggest you speak first to the doctor. If you decide to change doctors for this reason be sure to let it be known that this switch was made because of intolerable waiting periods.

A preventative approach to waiting would be to call a half hour before going to your appointment to ask if appointments are on schedule. If they are running behind, you needn't rush to the waiting room!

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

Israel will close PA offices in Jerusalem: Netanyahu

By Jerusalem Post Staff

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said last week that he would not move forward in the peace talks unless the Palestinian Authority (PA) shut down its offices in Jerusalem.

"We cannot make progress in negotiations with the Palestinian Authority as long as there are violations [of the Oslo accords] in Jerusalem, and in every instance we will act to close down offices operating illegally in Jerusalem," Netanyahu told the cabinet.

Faisal Husseini, the top Palestinian official in Jerusalem, said that closing down Orient House, the PLO's headquarters in the city, would be a setback for Palestinians and Israelis alike.

The international Arabic newspaper Asharq al-Awsat quoted Husseini as saying: "For Palestinians, [Orient House] is a symbol of Jerusalem, which means that its closure would symbolize the exclusion of Jerusalem from the peace process and a loss of hope."

Netanyahu also criticized Internal Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani for the compromise he made last week with PA Council member Hattem Abdel Khader.

JERUSALEM — Since the 1991 Gulf war, Arab states have heavily stockpiled surface-to-surface missiles and the threat to Israel is much worse today than when Iraqi Scuds slammed into Tel Aviv, said an IDF official.

Despite this, one in every three Israelis does not have adequate shelter protection from missiles and some 400,000 people are without gas masks.

Nevertheless, OC Home Front Maj.-Gen. Shmuel Arad said the IDF is capable of protecting the population against air or missile attack.

"We can't totally prevent them, there is no total security," Arad said. "There is no other nation which faces threats like the State of Israel but the response given to the citizens today is the best and no other country in the world, including much wealthier ones, knows

The two soldiers are to be dismissed from the army for neo-Nazi activity. Disciplinary action is being considered against three others for similar offences.

ISRAEL

Minister Drops Bombshell

JERUSALEM – Israel's newly appointed Minister of Religious Affairs Eli Suissa dropped a bombshell this week, immediately after receiving the much-contested portfolio.

Suissa, who is also the interior minister, told reporters that the Religious Affairs Ministry should be dismantled.

"The subject needs to be investigated, though it will arouse opposition from some political parties and rabbis, and so it must be done with great sensitivity," he said.

He proposed placing local religious councils under the auspices of the Interior Ministry, with other religious matters being handled by the ministries of Education and Justice.

Exorcising Dybbuks

JERUSALEM – A Group of kabbalists was to gather this week to conduct a mass public prayer to exorcise dybbuks from people suffering from mental and emotional problems. This will be the first time such prayers are held in public.

The prayers will be conducted on Monday in Yeshivat Hashalom in Jerusalem. The rabbis, who will be fasting that day, will blow shofars in the ears of the sick, a traditional kabbalistic method for exorcising bad spirits. They will also say special prayers.

Jerusalem 3000 Awards

JERUSALEM – Larry King, host of CNN's Larry King Live, and Harvard Law professor Alan Dershowitz were among the nine honorees to receive the Jerusalem 3000 Award for their commitment to Israel and the Jewish people.

, King was one of the prime movers behind the just-concluded Jerusalem 3000 Summer Solidarity Mission which brought more than 40 media trendsetters and business leaders to Israel.

Concert Uproar

JERUSALEM – Hundreds of angry Jewish concert-goers walked out of a gospel music concert here when the event assumed the trappings of an evangelical prayer service.

The Aug. 1 concert, billed as a "Celebration of Gospel Music" by the Jerusalem municipality and the Jerusalem 3000 organizing committee, caused a stir when it took on definite missionary overtones.

While Jewish members of the audience were well aware that gospel music is Christian in content, many appeared shocked when Max Lucado, the event's master of ceremonies, repeatedly urged the audience to give prayerful thanks to "the Lord Jesus Christ, our Savior."

Bar Mitzvah In Zagreb

ZAGREB, Croatia – The Zagreb Jewish community recently celebrated its first bar mitzvah in over 12 years.

Ozren Tabakovic prepared for this special day by studying Torah and Jewish tradition with Moshe Meshulum, the JDC-supported Jewish outreach worker currently in Zagreb.

Summit In Jeopardy?

CAIRO – The regional economic summit planned for Cairo in November could be in jeopardy if peace talks do not resume by next month, Egyptian Ambassador Mohammed Bassiouny said last week.

He said in an interview that he believed the summit will be linked to the restarting of talks between Israel and Syria, Lebanon and the Palestinians.

There had been speculation recently that Egypt might cancel the summit unless Israel showed signs of resuming talks. No such ultimatum has been officially issued, but according to Bassiouny, "the idea of the summit is to show the fruits of peace. How can there be economic cooperation without peace?"

Priebke's Release Criticized

ROME – Jewish leaders here and abroad have joined an international chorus of criticism after a Rome military court freed former SS Capt. Erich Priebke while at the same time declaring him guilty of taking part in Italy's worst World War II atrocity.

The Aug. 1 ruling, which embarrassed the Italian nation, sent local officials scrambling to find legal solutions to ensure that Priebke, 83, was punished for crimes he admitted committing.

BORMANN ALIVE IN PARAGUAY

The world's most wanted war criminal Martin Bormann, Hitler's former private secretary, is living in poor health on a ranch in the Parana River region of Paraguay near the Argentine border, according to Israeli journalist Zvi Aldouby.

Aldouby said Bormann's ranch is situated among 14 German "colonies" mainly inhabited by former Nazis or their sympathizers.

Bormann has bought off the Cuchileros, the local Mafia, who serve as a security screen. He recently underwent a successful cancer operation and his appearance has been changed by facial surgery.

DISCRIMINATION DECLINES IN MEDICINE

Jewish medical students and interns are not meeting with the anti-Semitic prejudice that existed so blatantly a few years ago.

"It's still there all right," said one doctor, "but it is greatly reduced and [far less] overt. Today -unlike the 1940s - many Jews hold major positions in Toronto hospitals.

Top judge outlines importance of human rights

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Despite demands that governments slash their budgets, "we have many compelling reasons for protecting human rights," said Supreme Court of Canada Justice Claire L'Heureux-Dubé.

Speaking here at the recent 25th annual conference of the Canadian Association of Statutory Human Rights Agencies (CASHRA), L'Heureux-Dubé said protection of human rights is a "weighty concern" of the Supreme Court of Canada, which agreed early on that human rights legislation is not to be treated as another ordinary law of general application, but must be recognized for what it is — a fundamental law.

"The special nature of human rights legislation has remained axiomatic in the court's approach to human rights and to the interpretation of human rights legislation."

She said the protection of human rights is inextricably tied to human dignity. "We brought this point home in our first pronouncement of the equality provision of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, when we stated that the promotion of equality entails the promotion of a society in which all are secure in the knowledge that they are recognized at law as human beings deserving of concern, respect and consideration."

She observed that equality-seeking members of society "are not simply clamoring for more rights; fundamentally a person who seeks equality wants the dignity that comes from recognition as a full member of society, with the same rights and responsibilities as everyone else."

She said in the short term, equality may come at some cost, especially for those who have benefited from discrimination.

"But the equal dignity of every member of the community is a value of the highest order, and I hope money is not a measure of that dignity."

L'Heureux-Dubé said even after it has been shown that non-discrimination is an essential precondition to a free and democratic society, some economists and accountants still ask how much it costs and whether we can afford it.

Another speaker at the conference, William Pentney, general counsel, the Canadian Human Rights Commission, analyzed some of the human rights decisions made by the Supreme Court.

He cited specifically the Malcolm Ross decision, in which the complainant filed against a school board in New Brunswick, for failure to take appropriate steps to provide educational services free from a "poisoned environment." The allegations stemmed from the off-duty conduct of teacher Malcom Ross.

Pentney said the court ultimately affirmed that teachers are inextricably linked to the integrity of the school system and that schools communicate the fundamental values of the society and must be premised on principles of tolerance and impartiality.

PURSUING PEACE

Chayim Levy takes peace seriously. The 71-year-old retired French teacher has spray-painted his 1987 Chevrolet Monte Carlo a rainbow of colors highlighted by doves and the word "peace" in Hebrew, Arabic, English, French, German, Latin, Spanish, Greek, and Italian. His idea stemmed from the 1993 Oslo peace accord. "The car is a protest against all these stupid wars in the Middle East. People in Canada only know of war's horrors from TV and newspapapers. It's far from their consciousness." Students at North York Board of Education schools, as well as at the United Synagogue Day School and the Bialik Hebrew Day School on Bathurst Street, where Levy does supply teaching have another word for it, he says. "All the kids know my car. They come out and say 'Cool.'" [Gil Kezwer photo]

Browsing through the U.S. Jewish press

Each week, I receive a constant stream of interesting reading material. Indeed, that is one of the great privileges and pleasures of my work. As summertime tends to provide a few more hours than usual to pore over the material, I shall excerpt some brief but noteworthy selections from three American publications which came across my desk last week.

The publications selected represent a spectrum of thought. Two of them, The New York Jewish Week, and The Forward can be called Jewish publications. The third, The New Republic is not a Jewish publication per se, but its editor-in-chief and chairman, Martin Peretz, has ensured that the magazine is a bold, assertive advocate on behalf of Israel. They each appear weekly.

Gary Rosenblatt is the editor and publisher of The New York Jewish Week. In these pages previously, I have described him as the pre-eminent editor in the North American Anglo Jewish press. It is no exaggeration. He combines sharp, incisive insight, smooth, unpretentious writing, a blazingly fast wit, a hilarious, dry sense of humor, a love of and deep respect for the integrity of journalism with the finest of human qualities. In addition to the editorials in the newspaper, he writes a weekly column Between The Lines.

Seizing upon the occasion of the annual late summer conference of the Coalition for the Advancement of Jewish Education (CAJE), he wrote in the issue of July 26 about the need to improve the working conditions for Jewish educators.

Describing CAJE as an organization that represents "much that is alive and creative about Jewish education these days," Rosenblatt urges local federations to assist teachers to attend the conference, which this year is being held in Jerusalem. He decries the lack of any concerted effort to assist Jewish educators from benefiting from the conference.

He sees this as further proof that Jewish educators are regarded as "the Rodney Dangerfields of our community...that they 'don't get no respect.' We pay them low wages and expect them to provide our offspring with the kind of knowledge of and love for Yiddishkeit that used to be the purview of parents and grandparents."

Despite the fact that "the organized Jewish community gnashes its teeth over the increase in intermarriage and assimilation and agrees that Jewish education is the most effective antidote, the community has not made the behavioral change necessary to improve the status and quality of our schools." Among the behavioral changes which Rosenblatt calls for is the recognition followed by the requisite action "to do our best to improve the lot" of the Jewish educators. He makes a compelling case.

The lead editorial of The Forward of July 26, Time for Retaliation, responds to the crash of TWA flight 800. The editorial writer urges the government of the United States to start thinking now about appropriate retaliatory measures should terrorism prove to have been the cause of the crash. The writer ridicules "at least two American administrations" for their weak, insignificant response to the Pan Am flight 10 Lockerbie crash. The explosion should not be treated by investigators as an act of criminality, but rather as an act of war.

"There is a danger, though, in treating the matter as a mere law enforcement problem. America is being targeted by a war in which foreign governments are complicit. Even without a conclusion in the TWA case, there has been more than enough aggression in this war to warrant any American administration going on the offensive."

In the Aug. 5 issue of The New Republic, Peretz contributed an article entitled Israel Bonds, Benjamin Netanyahu, superstar. Written after Netanyahu's appearance before the American Congress, the article, as its title suggests, is a ringing paean of tribute to Israel's new prime minister. It is also a stinging rebuke of former prime minister Shimon Peres, some of Israel's potential peace partners, U.S. secretary of state Warren Christopher and the middle east policy planners, including special envoy Dennis Ross and Ambassador Martin Indyk, whom Peretz derisively calls the "grey suits of the State Department".

Here is a sampling of Peretz's analysis. "Still, it is not hard to grasp why Israel's pluck — its self-reliant military (so much in contrast with wards like Saudi Arabia and Kuwait), its entrepreneurship, its toughness of mind — appeals to Americans. You could almost touch that affinity when Netanyahu was in Washington in a way that you never did when Shimon Peres, the fussy poet of literary paradox, visited. For all his slickness, Netanyahu seems to Americans to incarnate his country's strength of character, not quite as much as the gruff soldier Yitzhak Rabin, but close..." MBD

Volunteers needed to address 'critical' issues: JWF president

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jill Reitman is hard pressed to single out her priorities as president of Jewish Women's Federation (JWF).

"They're all areas that are really important," she says, citing some of the issues being addressed by the Toronto umbrella organization, among them agunot, violence against women, women and poverty, continuity and women, women and leadership, and outreach to newcomers through the Shalom Toronto program, a joint project with UJA Women's Campaign.

The organization has some 50 local affiliate Jewish women's organizations, as well as an evolving "partnership" with UJA Women's Campaign. Among Reitman's priorities is working with the affiliates as well as with Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (UJA Federation) agencies to reach common goals for the benefit of women in the community.

Jill Reitman

Among JWF's main areas of involvement are social and political action, for which Violence Against Women will be this year's main focus; and the Community Response project on Jewish poverty, which was organized in response to government cutbacks and which ran a successful summer clothing drive earlier this year.

Reitman, 41, a longtime community volunteer who recently succeeded Glennie Lindenberg as JWF president, is undaunted by the amount of work needed on each issue.

"Each time, you make a little more of an inroad. Awareness is the first step ... the goal is to eliminate the need."

She is convinced that volunteers will make time, despite busy schedules, to deal with "critical" issues.

To ease the process, she believes in trying to minimize the number of meetings, keeping them short and communicating by phone and fax. "Modern technology is here, and we use it. We need it."

Although Reitman, a mother of two boys, is not averse to working late at night or early in the morning, sometimes her volunteer commitments cut into her family time. Missing one of her son's baseball games is "the most difficult compromise," she says.

In addition to JWF, Reitman has also been involved in fundraising for United Jewish Appeal for many years, and is active on the board of United Synagogue Day Schools as well as on the board and executive of UJA Federation.

Branson still seeking partner

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Still fighting for its life, North York Branson Hospital is looking for a partner or partners in hospital services to save dollars and still meet the needs of its elderly community.

"We're still open to negotiations," said senior vice-president Brian Fenton, noting that "months" of negotiations with Baycrest and Mt. Sinai hospitals had so far been unsuccessful. Other potential partners are being sought, he said, but Baycrest and Mt. Sinai have not been ruled out.

A report now before the provincial government calls for Branson to be merged with York-Finch and to become an ambulatory care centre.

But York-Finch has just proposed to the provincial restructuring commission that it merge with Humber Memorial and Northwestern.

Fenton said that in any Branson negotiations for a partner, the emergency cardiology needs of an elderly population subject to heart disease will be crucial.

He was non-commital on whether Branson would remain as a hospital with 258 in-patient beds. During the vacation period, 30 beds are closed.

It will be some weeks before the situation is clarified, Fenton said, because the commission has said it will not announce a decision until mid-fall.

Branson had to cope with a cut of $3.2 million in its 1996-97 budget resulting, among other things, in a staff reduction of 70 people, some of this to be achieved by voluntary retirement. However, it did not close down any beds.

The commission's decision to close two hospitals in Thunder Bay, leaving only one, and its rationale that no hospital needs to be closer than 20 kilometres to its patients would cause" concern" to any hospital, Fenton said.

Chai Dancers celebrate 18 years of performances

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Chai Dancers, a troop of performers age 65 to 83, recently celebrated their chai year with dinner, dancing and reminiscing.

Some 30 current and former dancers gathered at the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) for the 18th anniversary festivities.

The troop operates as part of the BJC's senior adult services department and is the braindhild of department supervisor Teme Kernerman. Kernerman said she wanted to create a seniors dance group with a high level of performance — they meet bi-weekly for two-hour sessions.

"I didn't want anyone thinking they're good for seniors," she said.

The reunion was "absolutely fabulous," but also "extremely emotional" when participants watched old videos of their performances, Kernerman said. "They enjoyed reliving their experiences through the video, as some of them can no longer dance."

The dance troop has been a "wonderful experience," said Saidie Sobel, one of two people to receive a red corsage that evening for being with Chai since the beginning. Sobel stressed that the close ties between group members have been especially important.

"We are going to be friends forever," she said. "We celebrate everything together."

"We go for birthdays but we don't count them," said Vy Wolf, president of the Chai dancers, who has been dancing with them for 16 years. One of Wolf's most memorable experiences was being filmed for the 1992 made-for-TV movie, Last Wish, starring Maureen Stapleton and Patti Duke. "They [the film crew] treated us royally," she recalled.

The dancers were part of a scene which was supposedly set at the 92nd Street Y in New York City, where Stapleton was taking a dance class, Kernerman explained. "They called me. They had heard of me. They wanted me to choreograph and bring seniors to be part of the scene."

The Chai Dancers have also appeared on many stages, including at Roy Thompson Hall, the Royal Ontario Museum, the Premier Dance Theatre, the Ontario Place Forum, Earl Bales Park and Leah Posluns Theatre.

Dora Green, the other 18-year member of the troop, said one of the highlights of Chai was participating at the awards ceremony at the Premier Dance Theatre in 1991, when Kernerman won the Ontario Arts Council Award for her contribution to folk dancing.

Some members of the troop have particularly fond memories of their performances for children. "It's the most enjoyable feeling performing for children," said Kitty Cohen, a former Chai dancer. She was with the troop for seven years, but now concentrate on clogging (step-dancing).

"When we perform for schools, I've watched the faces of the children looking at this group of elderly people at the beginning with amusement. And then there is total disbelief and respect and enjoyment," Kernerman said. "They think this is going to be a joke. Then they applaud and cheer."

High Holy Day classes offered

TORONTO — Aish HaTorah in Thornhill, Ont. is partnering with five synagogues in the Greater Toronto Area to conduct alternative classes on the meaning and relevance of the High Holy Days.

The focus of the classes is to help worshippers understand the significance of many of the traditional prayers and customs they take part in during the High Holy Day services. All sessions will be adapted to the individual needs of participants to make the instruction meaningful for Jews from all backgrounds at this time of introspection and self-analysis.

Some locations will provide separate children's educational programs, where children will be grouped according to age.

The classes will be conducted during Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur services at six Aish HaTorah locations in Thornhill, Richmond Hill, North York and Forest Hill, as well as at the five participating synagogues: Anshe Minsk Synagogue, Congregation Shaarei Tzedec, Beth Jacob Congregation, Magen David Sephardic Congregation and Sephardic Yerushalmi Minyan.

In most centres, classes will be conducted by some 20 volunteers, who, with their families, will attend the service where they are leading the educational sessions.

The volunteers are trained not only to offer instruction and insight into the High Holy Days, but also to help the synagogues reach out to their own communities. In some instances, they will train the shul members or staff to lead the classes.

A list giving the time and topic of classes accompanies the schedule of High Holy Day services at each centre or synagogue.

The aim, but not the method

Two weeks ago President Bill Clinton signed into law The Iran and Libya Sanctions Act. Cut from the same cloth as the Helms-Burton law, it extends the reach of American law to non-American companies by imposing sanctions on them for investing heavily in Iran or Libya.

The law requires the president to impose two sanctions from a list of a possible seven, against foreign corporations that make new investments worth more than $40 million (US) for the development of petroleum resources in Iran or Libya. It also imposes sanctions on foreign companies that violate existing United Nations prohibitions against trade with Libya in certain goods and services.

In truth, the law is more symbolic than substantive. Republican Senator Alphonse D'Amato of New York, its driving force, acknowledged as much when he said, "It was an important signal and first step."

The legislation applies only to new investments, but at the moment, none of the investments looming on the horizon appear to be in the required scale, namely $40 million. The list of sanctions is quite broad, some of them relatively minor, some more severe. But, in any case, the president can waive particular sanctions or delay them altogether for two successive 90-day periods.

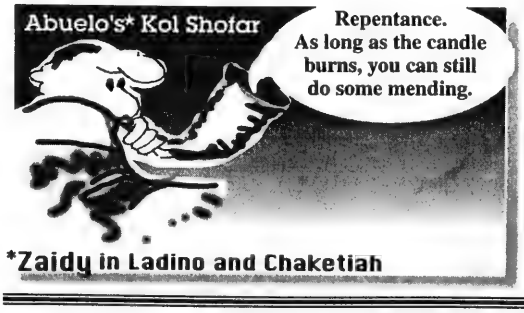
After he signed the law, Clinton described Iran and Libya as "two of the most dangerous supporters of terrorism in the world." We agree with him. He called terrorism "the enemy of our generation." We agree with him. He went on to say: "You cannot do business with countries that practise commerce with you by day while funding or protecting the terrorists who kill you and your innocent civilians by night." We emphatically agree with him.

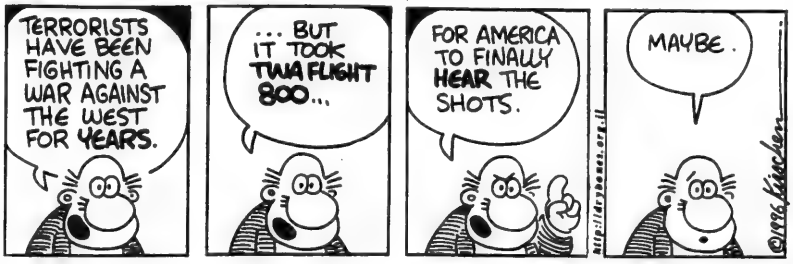
In this very space just two weeks ago, we urged Canada to take the lead in "a concerted, cooperative campaign among all countries whose highest striving is [the] affirmation of the sanctity and the importance of human life" to cast out from the arena of international commerce and multilateral relations, those nations which endorse, encourage, support, maintain, aid or abet terrorists in any way.

We also expressed the hope that American legislators would enact a bill of sanctions against the countries who shelter terrorists. But the American bill does not attack the countries which "export" terror. Rather, it purports to attack non-American corporations that deal with two of those countries.

While we are pleased by the law's intent, we are troubled by its method. Washington could have imposed a comprehensive blanket of direct, serious sanctions of its own against Iran and Libya and other countries – such as Syria and Iraq – which have been incontrovertibly proven to be exporters of terror. Or it could have used its substantial influence more vigorously to achieve a forceful multilateral, economic boycott of the two countries. Such steps would have been welcome, appropriate and even possibly, effective.

But it is not entitled to determine the foreign and trading policies of the nationals of other countries, however despicable or distasteful their behavior.





TERRORISTS HAVE BEEN FIGHTING A WAR AGAINST THE WEST FOR YEARS.

FOR AMERICA TO FINALLY HEAR THE SHOTS.

A maven pins us to mat

I read with interest the article "Book collector finds Yiddish typewriter." (CJN, July 18)

Having spent a good part of my life in the typewriter business, I was quite surprised by the fact that the typewriter used in the illustration accompanying the article — very clearly a Royal typewriter — was identified throughout as an Underwood.

I am a devoted reader of The CJN, and was disappointed to see such an obvious error get past the editor. But now I am quite curious about the identity of the typewriter that Goldenberg managed to find. Is it a Royal or an Underwood?

Editor's note: This sharp-eyed reader is correct. Goldberg owns two Yiddish typewriters but the Royal (circa unknown) photographed better and was not mentioned in the story.

Protecting students with nut allergies

Congratulations to Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto on the new policy of eliminating peanut/nut products from their campuses, effective Sept. 3. Associated Hebrew Schools has in attendance approximately 25 students with potential life threatening allergies (anaphylaxis) to peanuts and nut products. Although these students represent a small fraction of the entire student body, the implementation of this significant nut-free policy demonstrates the leadership, concern and care taken by Associated Hebrew Schools in creating as safe an environment as possible for each and every student.

His pension hangs in balance

At age 72 and in ill-health, I am searching for anybody who can testify that they knew me in 1944, when I was prisoner for one year at the Brunslau concentration camp in Silesia.

It may determine my right to receive a pension of $400 to $500 from Germany.

While I was at Brunslau, another prisoner and I, unbeknownst to each other, were by sheer accident tattooed with the same number, 49,000.

I was turned down for a pension because when authorities searched the records, they said the Brunslau prisoner with the same number had already died.

Did Heinrich Heine predict future?

I see there is controversy about Goldhagen's book — whether the average German was anti-Semitic, for want of another word.

I recall once having seen an observation by Heinrich Heine that the Germans would one day take it out on the Jews.

I don't know whether Heine was a Jew, but he certainly was a respected German poet or author. If this statement is correct, it means that the anti-Jewish feeling was endemic in Germany during Heine's time — he died about 1850.

It also means that Hitler, 100 years later, was harnessing that feeling for his own purposes.

Lauds role of BBYO at camp

With great shock did I read the article by Ron Csillag "BBYO Canada closes" in your Aug. 1 issue.

For four years, our committee had the pleasure of working with members of BBYO, bringing a Jewish program to a summer camp of MTHA, North York Committee on Community, Race & Ethnic Relations in Camp Woodland Trails.

All our leaders who worked with these young people were deeply impressed by the high quality of leadership, knowledge of Jewish traditions and enthusiasm that made these programs so successful. We, as well as the North York Committee, hoped for and achieved a break-down of stereotyping and prejudices and a widening of the horizons of these youngsters.

It is hard for me to understand that one of the oldest and largest Jewish youth organizations is not receiving the utmost of support from our community.

There is nothing better to give our youth the necessary pride in being Jewish than a healthy experience in a youth movement. Just examine the role that members of youth movements have played during the darkest period of our history and in the establishment of the State of Israel.

The loneliness of the single Jew

By ELLA MORRISON

My paternal grandmother is an old world matchmaker. When I was 18 years old, she sent me a photograph of a 30-year-old Romanian dentist who was passing through Israel, paid her a visit, saw my schoolgirl photos on her wall, and expressed an interest. How convenient, she thought, that he should happen to be traveling through the United States soon. Perhaps he should make a stop in Toronto?

Fiddler on the Roof celebrated 30 years of "Tradition" this summer, and my rented video copy brought back this old memory with a smile, although I found it somewhat less than amusing at the time. My grandmother, like Yente, is a shrewd businesswoman who has supported herself for over 40 years by bringing people together. Her efforts to find a match for me in my teenage years were met with disdain, but I can't help but contemplate my destiny if I had lived in another time Certainly, to be unmarried at the age of 32 would be unheard of in any other generation. I would be pitied and stigmatized. Yet in our modern world, where the shtetl no longer exists, and Yente has retired herself to yesteryear, to be single and looking, and looking for a Jew, is not only a solitary concern, but an ideal shared by an unwavering many. And this ideal transcends age and time.

Just as it is not difficult to find Jews who have chosen to intermarry, on any given Saturday night in Toronto it is easy to find others with a similar quest as mine. On average, there are two singles events each week which cater to single Jews determined to find their match on a crowded dance floor. I know – that was me, last week, a silhouette in the corner against the flashing lights from the DJ's station, wiping the condensation off the Diet Coke I had been nursing for an hour (more a prop than a refreshment), listening to how my girlfriend didn't feel the event was effective enough to justify the $15.00 admission.

"Keep moving. We have to circulate," I advised.

I was Looking For Mr. Goodbar in all the right places. Was he here tonight? Not likely, is my conclusion. From a whole room of attractive singles aged 25-40, how many connections were made that night? Mingle, shmingle. My plight is beginning to sound like a Toronto Star 'Missed Connection':

"I saw you at the fundraiser. You were well groomed and nicely dressed, and carried yourself with an air of confidence. You also looked right through me when I smiled in your direction. It was obvious you were there for the same reason as I, yet when you found a group of acquaintances, you gravitated to them like a sinking man to a lifebuoy, grateful for the excuse not to have to look. It's a pity. I would have looked back."

Tevye the Milkman alluded to One Great Matchmaker, and I tend to share this romantic notion. After all, destiny threw a wonderful man in my path three years ago. It was totally unexpected, I was totally helpless to his charms, and he was blessedly Jewish. For a long time, I believed he was my bashert, but I was wrong. The idea, therefore, that Mr. Right might still be out there fills me with both hope and anticipated excitement. Lightning has been known to strike in the same place twice. And I am, after all, 32 years old. How can I help create a lightening storm? Should I be helping fate along? Or is it completely out of my hands? Tseitel meets the Woman of the 90's.

In her teens, "Eve" believed that love could conquer all, that two people of different cultures and faiths could plausibly find each other and make a life together. But as she grew older, she also heard the Fiddler on the Roof melody and heralded back to "Tradition."

A fundraising boat cruise on Lake Ontario introduced her to a friendly group of people. It was also an opportunity, through subsequent volunteer work with them, to enlarge her circle of acquaintances, both male and female, and was an unexpected source of blind dates.

"You talk to people over the phone, and they ask you out. It's a Jewish charity, so you know there are always Jews there. There's a singles division, so you had an opportunity right there and then to meet other singles and everyone you meet wants to set you up. I don't know what it is, but Jewish people, especially women, have this thing about them--they all want to be matchmakers. You meet one person and 'Oh, you're single?' And if you're somewhat attractive and half decent looking, they say 'I'll find you someone!' It's a mission for them."

Eve's personal mission filled her dance card every weekend for nearly a year. She greatly preferred the blind date over any other vehicle of introduction, as she found these men to be of purer motivation. Blind dating, she explained to me, required taking an enormous personal risk and effort. Anyone willing to stand on her doorstep and be peered at through the peephole already had something in common with her. The despondency when the evening turned out to be less than fruitful often made Eve examine and reaffirm her commitment to herself and her future: her bashert was still out there. And he was Jewish.

During a period of two years, the name "Adam" came up in conversation between Eve and friends from widely differing social circles no fewer than four times. Each time, Eve was reluctant to meet him. She was friends with his brother, to whom she had no physical attraction. She feared that Adam would resemble him. Eventually, her friends' reassurance wore her down. Four different people couldn't be wrong, could they?

They certainly weren't. Eve and Adam met in January 1993 and were married in August of the same year. "Who says miracles don't happen?" she beamed.

A Hollywood ending? Maybe. But certainly Eve's result was a combination of luck, persistence, and perhaps a strong ability to recognize good fortune when it appeared. Too many men, already in their late 30's, she complained, had a deep fear of commitment.

"When you're in high school, you could be dating someone for 2 or 3 years--it's nothing. You reach a certain point in your life where you spend 2 or 3 months with someone, and you may not know 100% if this is the man you want to marry, but you know for sure if you don't. You don't have to waste as much time."

I listened with complete understanding, reminded of my last relationship. It appeared that the generational phenomenon of indecision has seeped into the Jewish community too, in part attributed to the high divorce rate, with all of its emotional and financial ramifications. It's difficult to choose to marry when all around you, you observe your friends, and maybe even your parents, experiencing the pain of going it alone again.

As one gets older, time heaves more experience, not always positive, on one's shoulders and the load gets heavier with each passing year. Nowhere does the fear become more apparent or surface more readily than when one is faced with the prospect of meeting someone new, someone potentially interesting, someone with whom one could possibly fall in love, across that crowded room. It requires courage, confidence, and a willingness to not judge the opposite sex superficially. It also requires a faith that this one might be the one.

My eyes had scanned the room a thousand times before they met his in recognition. Too late. He'd seen me.

"Do you remember me?" he asked.

"Of course," I replied politely with a smile.

I'd seen him at every Jewish singles function I'd attended over the last several years. As usual, he began to talk about himself, about his efforts at meeting someone, the experimental approaches, the new side interests.

"I've started taking long walks. I find it clears the head. I meditate while I walk--it helps me put things in perspective..."

I was not able to inject a word sideways for three minutes as I listened sympathetically. My girlfriend had already looked the other way. I might have been trapped, but she could still escape.

Behind me, I heard a female voice whisper, "Look--he's talking to her now."

I felt sorry for him. And then he asked me, for the umpteenth time in several years, "I don't suppose you want to give me your phone number?"

I shook my head sadly.

"We can just go out for a coffee, and maybe you could tell me what's wrong with my approach, what I could be doing better..."

His voice trailed off as I apologized, still smiling.

"Well, thank you for smiling, thank you for the positive reinforcement."

"Good luck," I called to him sincerely as he walked away into the crowd, still buoyant, still positive. Forever hopeful.

My friend couldn't believe that he was still around, still coming to these events. He always will, I told her, until he finds someone. He won't let go of the dream. To his credit, he was the only man to have approached us all night, and for that, I admire and respect him. For that, I gave him the courtesy of at least listening.

Finding the perfect mate has never been easy. In a scene from Fiddler on the Roof which captures the difficulty, Tseitel and Motel the tailor struggle to convince Tevye that they have the right to "arrange" their own happiness.

My girlfriend has started writing to single Jewish men in New York City because she's tired of running into old dates at these functions. Of the dozen letters she has sent out in response to ads in New York magazine, only one has contemplated the possibilities of a long distance romance and replied. His letter was warm, funny, and unpretentious. His photo, a standard mug shot taken in business shirt and tie, shows a wide, friendly grin. Could a friendship, or maybe even more, develop over the miles? It's a hopeful start.

I haven't attempted a long distance romance in several years. Nor have I had the courage to try a matchmaking service, although with each passing day I am closer to embracing my Romanian legacy. My biological timeclock ticks quietly away, a perpetual reminder. My modern sensibilities dictate that I should manipulate this aspect of my life no differently than I do my career and social life if I am to obtain the results I desire. Soon I will have to seek alternative ways to meet single Jewish men. Like "Eve", I'll have to commit myself to more concentrated efforts if I am to make this part of my life's dream come true.

But until the day I decide to help destiny along, I'll be the one scanning the crowded room, Diet Coke in hand, glancing occasionally heavenward with Tevye-like earnestness: "Just once, could you give this nice Jewish girl a break?"

Celebrating Shabbat in Venice

Because he was Jewish, Shylock, in Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice, suffered many misfortunes in Venice. But, in contrast to Shylock's experience, my Jewishness resulted in good fortune for me during my stay in Venice in mid-July.

By Vera Press

I arrived on a Friday morning and headed to Ostello Santa Fosca, the hostel I had chosen because of its proximity to the Jewish Ghetto. Although the ghetto was only a 10-minute walk from my hostel, I found myself lost in the labyrinth of Venice, and my map only compounded my confusion. Finally, after 25 minutes of crossing bridges, walking in circles and backtracking through a number of side streets and alley ways, I reached the ghetto.

The New Ghetto, which is in fact, the Old Ghetto (the misnomer results from an Italian mix-up) houses the German, French and Italian synagogue. The Spanish and Levantine synagogues are in what is now commonly termed the Old Ghetto.

On my way from the New Ghetto to the Old Ghetto, I passed a small store that had a sign inscribed in black letters, "Habad House." Inside, against the back wall there were bookshelves with Hebrew texts. The other walls were filled with shelves of kosher food imported from Israel. At a small table near the bookshelves sat a Lubavitcher and a hip teenager: Mendel Bellinov and Yaron Schechtman.

Mendel hailed from the Milan Lubavitch Community, and Yaron was from Ferrara. Both Mendel and Yaron were in Venice for the summer. Their job was to ensure that Jewish visitors feel welcome. And that was what I certainly felt in this Habad house in Venice. Very welcome.

Sephardi service

Before I had even crossed the threshold of the store, Yaron asked me what I was doing for Shabbat that night. He then proceeded to tell me that it is customary after Friday night services, which are held at the Spanish shul, for all the congregants to return to the Habad for a Shabbat meal. I thanked him for the invitation and said I would be happy to be one of the guests.

Families, couples and students made up the 80 or so congregants at this Sephardi service. The rabbi was away so the congregants took turns leading the prayers. The service which began at 7:30 p.m., lasted about an hour and a half.

We left the synagogue in a long procession, attracting the curious and amused attention of diners eating alfresco in neighboring restaurants. The short walk from the shul back to the Habad was both joyful and disquieting. It was the first time in the two months since I had left Toronto that I was with a large group of Jews. And that made me happy. But, we were very conscious that relative to the Jewish presence in the ghetto at its most populous, about 5,000 residents in the mid-17th century, we were in reality a very small group of people, and most of us were non-resident. Only five Jewish families still reside in this ghetto.

At the Habad dining room, across the piazza from the Habad house, the tables were set up in a square formation. Yehudit, a volunteer from Israel, greeted us warmly and begged us to sit down.

We sang Shalom Aleichem and made kiddush. Then it was time to play Jewish geography. It just so happened that the two Canadians sitting beside me were from Montreal. Although I had met the one the previous year in November when I was visiting a friend at McGill, we did not immediately recognize each other. In the meantime the other Montrealer and I soon established that we had a number of friends in common from my Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto graduating class (1993).

Throughout the whole meal, as we ate our way through the challah, chicken and veggies, we sang zemirot. Conversation in both Hebrew and English unfolded. And every so often Yehudit would shout out, "Eat, eat! There's lots of food. Eat!" It was truly a Shabbat meal in the best of traditions.

And, every Shabbat, Jewish travellers who are in Venice will have the same welcoming experience.

Shylock would be amazed.

91-year-old gets PhD

Some weeks ago, my cousin Walter Gumprich of Saskatoon visited us with his daughter Gail. They celebrated Shabbat with us and then continued their trek to Montreal where they had a very special celebration. It concerned an old friend of the family, Dagobert Broh, and it is his tale that I want to share with you.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Broh was born in Berlin in 1904 and later moved to Muenster, the city in which both Walter and I (and my late mother) were born.

When the Nazis came into power, German Jews who could get away fled to the four corners of the globe, and it so happened that Walter and his family and Broh ended up in Canada. The latter made his home in Montreal where he became a bookkeeper and later manager of an export company. A man of great energy, he spent his vacations hiking the Rocky Mountains no fewer than eight times (driving there by himself); he travelled much and above all, he kept his intellectual interests alive. His family had not been able to afford him a university education, and he had always felt that he had missed something essential.

So, when he retired from his job, he began to turn to education as his full-time occupation. He entered Concordia University and at age 76, obtained his BA in French. He went on to study and 10 years later was awarded an MA in history. All along he knew that there were still more goals to reach, and his studies led him to go for a PhD.

An interviewer for Concordia University Magazine reported Broh as saying that to continue one's education there must be the will to learn. "If that's not there, then there is no use to go to school again ... If people want to learn something, then they should go back to school."

It took him 7½ years to write his 460-page thesis, which focused on the German language newspaper Aufbau, founded in New York in 1934 for German-Jewish immigrants as a bridge between the old homeland and the new. The Montreal Gazette had this to say: Aufbau's goal, as Broh puts it, was to help readers "become good Americans and self-assured Jews."

Broh studied the paper and its impact across the decades, and produced his meticulously researched thesis. He confessed that he did not expect it to take that long "but, with aging, nothing goes quite as fast as before."

He spent 10-hour days writing the thesis. At first he used his old typewriter, but at age 88, he learned to use a computer to finish it. Now that it is done and he has defended it and obtained the coveted title of PhD, he isn't sure what he will do next. "When I studied, I knew what I had to do all day," he says longingly. "I have to find a new routine."

I have no doubt that he will. Intellectual curiosity knows no bounds and age is no hindrance.

Heartiest congratulations to this newest candidate for the Guinness Book of Records, who sets an example for all of us.

Working in, and for, a community

I've been writing for as long as I can remember — I self-published my first book at the age of three.

And everyone used to say to me, "You have to go into journalism! You'd make such a good reporter," but I never thought I would be interested. Journalism did not seem creative and the writing looked so dry. I thought if I became a journalist I would lose all my drive to write short stories, novels and poetry. I would smile at all the encouraging people and say politely, "No, I really just want to write."

By Sidura Ludwig

This spring, I began looking for a summer job. I'm the first to admit I am idealistic. I didn't just want a 9 to 5 retail job. I wanted to work in my field; I wanted to gain the "good experience" that everyone says we all need to get a job once we graduate.

I started telephoning a long list of publishers, hoping to hook up with an internship. My theory: if I could work at a publishing house, I would make publishing contacts and then when ready to hand in my first manuscript, I would know the right people in the right places.

But no one called me back. After two or three phone calls to each publisher, plus an updated resume to add to their files, I got a few letters back. Mainly, "Thank you for your interest in our company. We'll keep your resume on file for six months. We have nothing available at this time, but we'll let you know."

Of course — my mazel — the one place which did show an interest in me was The CJN, a newspaper. All of the sudden as a young woman adamantly against journalism, I found myself putting together the most impressive portfolio I could and praying that they would offer the opportunity to intern with them.

And when the editor called back after the interview and offered me this position, the same girl who thought journalistic writing was dry, found herself telling her family and friends that this would be an excellent experience.

I come from Winnipeg, which, I admit is a small town compared to Toronto. I chose to stay here for the summer to take advantage of Toronto's abundant opportunities. At the same time, I've been secretly searching for the homey feeling of a close knit community.

As I come to the end of my 12 week internship, I realize what I've been able to accomplish.

I've copy edited, I've reported and I've written — all the experiences I needed to come out of this summer feeling that I'm one step ahead. More than that, though, I've found here a mini-community and a sense of home that I hadn't felt before in this gargantuan city.

Every person who makes up this paper's staff has varying interests and niches. Each reporter is like a representative of parts of the community at large. There is this feeling, then, that everyone knows everyone else.

When my dad called from Winnipeg to take out a subscription, the staff in circulation said, "Oh, you're Sidura's father!"

That's what happens to me at home while I'm grocery shopping, or downtown, or in the North End. Someone will know me or my family. I never feel like I'm lost, and I always feel grounded.

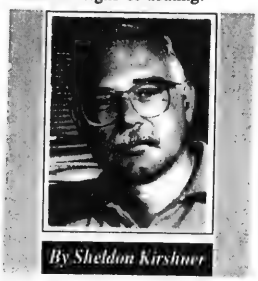
I'm not convinced that every journalistic experience I have will make me feel this way. I imagine that a lot of papers may be informal and cold, printing the news they believe the public wants to read.

At least here, I know the feeling of working for a community and working in one. I think rather than all the practical work experience I've received, I needed that more.

The Kirshner File

Controversy hits college's Jewish studies department

Queens College in New York City is at the centre of a controversy that shows no signs of abating.



By Sheldon Kirshner

Last month, Thomas Bird resigned as director of the Jewish studies program there, charging he had been hounded out of his newly appointed position by "primitive religious bigotry."

Bird, a Yiddishist and a former Soviet Jewry activist, is of the view that he was forced to resign because several of his colleagues were uneasy with his appointment.

One of Bird's chief critics, Samuel Heilman, a Queens College sociologist, suggested that Bird was unsuitable on two counts: he was neither academically qualified (Bird does not have a PhD) nor right as a "role model" for his Jewish students (he is a Catholic).

The Bird affair, which transcends New York's geographic boundaries, has polarized opinion in academia.

One of Heilman's staunchest defenders, Joseph Sungolowsky, a Queens College professor of French and Judaic studies, believes that only a Jew can be in tune with the Jewish students and members of the Jewish community taking Jewish-content courses.

Heilman heatedly denies that he is a racist. In a piece written for The Jewish Week, published in New York City, he praises Bird as "a man of integrity and honor, a fine teacher and a good friend of the Jewish people." And he maintains that non-Jews can and should teach in Jewish studies departments.

But having said that, Heilman argues that academic standards for Jewish studies should be no less rigorous than those of any other department. He adds that Jewish studies programs have a symbolic role, in that they provide "a legitimacy, stature and respect to Jewish studies on the campus, and underline the Jewish community's unique contribution to civilization and the academy." In this respect, Heilman notes, the head of a Jewish studies program serves as a "role model" for students and the Jewish community itself.

Allan Nadler, director of research at the YIVO Institute for Jewish Research, agrees with Heilman. Writing in The Forward, he states that accusations of racism hurled at Heilman debase the affair and preclude any serious exchange on the "real issue" — Bird's status as a scholar and his competence to lead a Jewish studies program.

Nadler writes that the most basic requirement for competence in the field is a mastery of Hebrew, the essential language of the Jewish experience.

"Bird is now being described as an accomplished Yiddishist who just happens not to have mastered Hebrew," Nadler observes. "But the very notion that one can be a serious scholar of Yiddish language, literature or culture without knowing Hebrew insults and demeans Yiddish more than it does Hebrew.

"Without access to ... Hebrew ... one can never master either the Yiddish language or truly comprehend Yiddish culture."

In concluding, Nadler says that Bird's appointment "reflects a disrespect for the seriousness" of Jewish studies on the part of Queen College's administration.

Lawrence Schiffman, a professor of Hebrew and Judaic studies at New York University and the author of Reclaiming the Dead Sea Scrolls, acknowledges that it is virtually impossible to properly pursue advanced research in the field without Hebrew.

Nevertheless, he has grave concerns. Bird, he charges in a piece in the Jewish World of Long Island, N.Y., was driven from office for "totally irrelevant reasons pertaining to his religious background, thus violating civil rights laws which the university is obligated by federal law to observe."

Jewish studies on the university level, he thinks, "cannot be confused with higher Jewish education given for Jewish communal purposes. They are just not the same thing."

Further on, he elaborates: "Only the misconception that Jewish studies is some form of Jewish parochial education within the university, or the notion that the Judaic studies professor is some kind of a clergyman, could lead anyone to think that only a Jew could head a Jewish studies department."

Henry Srebrnik, a political scientist affiliated with the University of Prince Edward Island in Charlottetown, is of the same mind.

"In a secular institution," he writes in an e-mail letter, "there must never be an ethnic or religious means test for either students or faculty, in any discipline."

Srebrnik, who has taught modern Jewish history at the University of Calgary and Middle East politics at Gettysburg College, goes on to say: "After all, many Jews have headed departments of French, Italian, Spanish and so on. We would be the first ones to complain were such posts reserved only for those with the 'proper' ethnic background.

"Such 'essentialism' has no place in an institution of higher learning," writes Srebrnik, the author of London Jews and British Communism 1935-1945. "Jewish studies programs are not designed to produce rabbis but to introduce students to Jewish learning. I don't think 'being' Jewish, as opposed to 'knowing' things Jewish, ought to be a requirement."

In an editorial, The Forward concurs with this thinking. "Secular institutions should not be treated as the Hebrew schools that many parents failed to take advantage of when their children were young. Nor should our universities be a substitute for Jewish education in the home ... If the study of Jewish history and thought is to be taken seriously at the university level, it must be treated as an academic discipline — not a branch of Hillel."

Obviously, the Bird affair has evoked considerable passion. What do you think? Was Bird fairly or unfairly treated? Let us know.

Films that are worth seeing

Worth seeing ...

A Time to Kill, Joel Schumacher's film set in Mississippi, turns on a well-worn theme — the racial divide in America.

A black man (Samuel Jackson) kills two rednecks who've raped his 10-year-old daughter. He hires a relatively inexperienced, local white lawyer (Matthew McConaughey) to defend him. The local chapter of the Ku Klux Klan gets involved, and there is further turmoil and bloodshed.

A Time to Kill, now playing at Cineplex Odeon theatres, is manipulative, contrived and predictable at times. But on the whole, it works like a clock, exposing the racial animosities and inequities of American society and highlighting the crucial differences between law and justice in the legal system.

Courage Under Fire, starring Denzel Washington and Meg Ryan, is the first major Hollywood film about the 1991 Gulf War. It's not bad, but don't expect a film about Middle East politics or personalities.

Attaining kapparah

By RABBI ARNOLD FINE

Instant communication, instant food, instant gratification, instant knowledge are often desired and seen as almost a right in today's society. At the same time, many of us know that something is missing and the "instants" do not really serve most of our needs.

The welcoming of the month of Elul this week reminds us that we, as Jews confronting a new year and its potential and responding to the difficulties and successes of the past, must begin the process of examining ourselves and getting ready for the experience and emotions of the coming Yamim Nora'im, the High Holy Days. This experience is not instant and cannot be called up on a computer or a CD-ROM. We require preparation if we are to understand and be moved by the power of this season.

Our tradition has taught that on the first day of Elul, Moses ascended to Mt. Sinai for the second time to receive the Tablets. He returned to the community on Yom Kippur, having attained kapparah, atonement for us. We therefore begin our own process of readiness at the beginning of Elul.

As the law codes emphasize, we blow the shofar from the first of Elul until the day before Rosh Hashanah, because the Torah refers to the sounding of the shofar in the Israelite camp as Moses climbed the mountain.

This tradition is a moral wake-up call to all of us, urging us to examine our lives and take the necessary steps to mend our souls. The sound of the Shofar shakes us from the moral and religious lethargy that we often encounter in our lives, and perhaps that is the reason it has such a central part of the prayer service in the Musaf of Rosh Hashanah. If we are awake to its message, it enters into the depths of our being. For most of us, that requires more than an "instant."

Also from the beginning of Elul until Shemini Atzeret at the end of Sukkot, in most communities, we recite Psalm 27, morning and evening. We do this to reflect an understanding of the midrash about the opening words of the Psalm: G-d is "my light" on Rosh Hashanah and "my salvation" on Yom Kippur and protects us "in His sukkah," during Sukkot. The midrash concludes with a hope that our trust in the Almighty will bring us strength and the ability to look after our religious, moral and emotional needs, which are so great during this season.

We all enter the synagogue during this season with the hope of experiencing the power of G-d. Too many of us, however, are like the fellow in a cartoon; he is on an escalator that has abruptly stopped and left him half way up. He calls to others to get a repairman, because he feels stranded and is going to wait for the mechanism to start again. Too many of us are stuck in a similar situation and must decide what we are to do. Shall we walk the distances, be they short or long, to attain the goals we have for the coming season, or are we going to wait until someone or something else takes us there?

With its traditions, Elul helps us get ready and reminds us that there are no short cuts, no satisfying "instants."

May we all be inscribed for a good and healthy new year!

Tribute to slain Israelis

TORONTO — Guests at a private dinner in Atlanta recently heard excerpts from a literary tribute penned by a Thornhill professor in honor of the 11 Israelis slain at the 1972 Munich Olympics.

The tribute, written by Manuel Linden, was read by Ankie Spitzer-Rekhess, widow of former fencing coach Andrei Spitzer and chief spokesperson for the families of the Israeli athletes.

She also discussed the tribute during an interview on Dialogue, a nation-wide Jewish radio program in the United States, said Cheryl Coco, spokesperson for the Israeli consulate general in Atlanta.

The tribute was originally shown at a commemorative service at the 1984 Olympic Games in Los Angeles and it was displayed poster-size at the Ontario Provincial Parliament buildings in Toronto.

Lest we forget—the Munich Disaster 1972

Indeed, one recoils in horror and shock from all such acts of terrorism against society and, the issue becomes not one of Zionism but, Internationalism in the growing menace of violence in our life.

In tribute to the 'Olympic 11' whose hearts were once filled with dreams of a full life—future peace and prosperity — trees will be planted in the holy land—they will be full of sap and green—they will flourish and bear fruit and provide much needed shade to the arid land of the holy land. To the gentle winds of the Negev, the trees will bend in prayer to the brave 'Olympic 11'— indeed, bend to the higher tribunal of justice and chant the memorable 'Kaddush' to the fallen Maccabees, as it was in patriarchal times of the Arameans 16th century BCE as it is today:

"Yisgadal, v'iskadash schmay raboh" The trees will extend to form around the fallen heroes a temple whose pillars will be strong and remain, as a perpetual minyan to the pain of 4,000 years—softly melting the stones of the desert with tears that, gently caress the shores of the holiest of lands and tears, that flow softly to the sea.

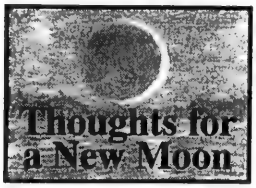
Indeed, a solemn day walks within the shadows of the tall trees and, as the trees stoop in silent devotion to the fallen heroes they allegorically express a message to mankind:

"The taller man grows, the greater he should bend to societal needs."

There is no conclusion, the tragedy will be gently softened in the retrospect of time. The struggle for survival, peace and the 'Greatest Good' will remain, as an indefatigable symbol of the Israelis. In tribute to the brave 'Olympic 11' the world can say:

"They were ready to live or die nobly." (Maccabees 4.55)

Jewish Life



Confronting oneself

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

This month we begin our introspection and our spiritual preparations for the High Holy Days. The most frightening journey for anyone is a journey inward whose final destination is outward. Jews must travel into the very reaches of the soul with frightening honesty, to assess and confront themselves. They must then take these assessments and confrontations and present them outwardly to God with the same frightening honesty.

Yet is it fair to hold someone accountable to religious truths and moral practices they may not have learned? Although we believe ignorance is no defence for a crime, the "crimes" included in our self-evaluations are often committed from perspectives that are completely acceptable in the world around us.

We may not worship idols or be guilty of murder or robbery, but these are not the only actions which we review and resolve. If we have engaged in gossip, or have embarrassed anyone, then we are equally guilty of very serious "crimes." How can our culture demand a standard of behavior that may be unknown to many Jews who have not had the opportunity to learn the complex value system that is Judaism?

The Talmud recognizes this concern and answers it with a discussion of the activities of an infant while it develops within the mother. The Talmud begins by describing the physical positioning of the infant: it appears "folded in" upon itself in its tucked position. There is a light present which allows it to see to the ends of the world and the infant is taught the entire Torah from beginning to end while it is developing inside.

The image is a beautiful one; we see an infant at its most protected time, engaged in the highest spiritual pursuit "folded in" because its focus is inward. It can see the entire world and is being taught the tools it will need to function positively within that world. And yet, the Talmud concludes by saying that once it is born, an angel touches the child's upper lip and all the knowledge is forgotten.

This conclusion is perplexing. Why spend nine months mastering the secrets of the universe only to forget them when your life begins?

Possibly the answer lies within the problem itself. One can accept the image of an unborn child glimpsing wisdom that is hidden, for can we truly understand the status of the soul at this stage? The problem is in not the learning — it is in the forgetting. Yet this is the very message of the image. How can we be expected to live by standards we may not have learned? Why would we search inwardly for meaning we may not possess?

The Talmud tells us that in fact we do possess this knowledge. The information grew inside us as we were becoming human. It has been coded into us in the same way as were our eye color and our hair color. Yet why must we forget? Because the journey toward knowledge is as important as the knowledge itself.

e-mail lists build a community

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

There are few moments as moving as a first encounter at the Western Wall.

What is you want to talk about your experience at the Kotel but have no one to share it with? or if you are trying to trace your family roots but don't know where to turn? Or if you can't find someone with whom to discuss the role of women within Judaism? Or want to catch up with long-lost friends from your youth movement but have no idea what ever became of them?

All you have to do is write a letter. And mail it on the Jewish Highway.

Actually, your letter is a piece of e-mail and it isn't addressed to anyone in particular but to something called a List. A list is simply a record of people from around the world who share a common interest. When a message is posted to a list, everyone who has joined automatically gets a copy of that letter.

But unlike conventional letters you get in the mail, this electronic exchange of correspondence is immediate and free. When you join an e-mail list, you have an opportunity to build a true sense of community...even if that community stretches around the world and is made up of members who will probably never meet in person.

There are several different kinds of lists which you can join. Some are moderated. That means that one person acts as a kind of gatekeeper to ensure that all messages sent in are appropriate before they are mailed out to the subscribers. Other lists are unmoderated. As soon as you send a message in, it is immediately sent out to everyone on the list. Unmoderated lists can be quite wild because there is no quality control. Finally, there are some lists that don't solicit public input. These lists can be compared to a column in a newspaper or newsletter to which people subscribe in order to receive essays from a respected writer.

Virtual Jerusalem

Once you've found a list that interests you, you need to know some basic commands in order to subscribe. For example, if I wanted to subscribe to Shamash's list on Jewish Music, I would send off the following e-mail message: TO: [listserv@shamash.nysernet.org] SUBJECT: And the message would read: subscribe jewish-music mark mietkiewicz

Note that Subject is left blank and that I have used my real name in the message and not my e-mail address. Shortly after you send off your message, you will receive an automatic reply that you have joined the list.

There are many other important list commands which I don't have the space to go into such as how to remove your name from a list and how to find out who else is subscribed to the list. One of the clearest summaries of those commands can be found in Virtual Jerusalem's Crash Course on Lists [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/lists/what.htm]. A more detailed explanation of Discussion Lists: Mail List Manager Commands can be found at [http://lawlib.slu.edu/training/mailser.htm].

A good place to start your hunt For Lists is using, what else, the Liszt search program [http://www.liszt.com/] which indexes over 50,000 Internet Lists. I found 62 matches for the word Israel and over 150 searching for Judaism, Jewish or Jews.

After the upcoming chagim, I'll devote a column to the best sites dedicated to Jewish and Israeli lists. And I'll explain how people with e-mail accounts can search out and participate in lists even if they don't have full Internet access.

Immigrants' stories told in fascinating new book

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When the Cowan (Cohen) family lived at 235 Maria St. in the Junction in the west end, the children ran over muddy roads and railroad tracks to school, and made their own footballs from the bladders of cows slaughtered in the nearby abbatoir.

One of them was Saul Cowan, now 85, former chair of the North York Board of Education. He was one of nine children, five brothers and four sisters. (Only four sisters, including Miriam Rose of Toronto, are still living.)

In his book Images in My Mind, a private publication, Cowan tells a fascinating story of the riches Jewish immigrants and their children brought to Toronto.

Cowan's father, Zvi Hirsh, was a gabbai at Knesseth Israel near their home, one of Toronto's oldest synagogues. His mother, Chana Leah (Gollom), he writes, once sent him next door to borrow a dollar because another neighbor needed it and there was no money in the Cohen house.

An older brother, Jack, was a longtime president of United Jewish Peoples Order; another, Norman, was active in promoting anti-discrimination legislation. A nephew, the late Bernard Cowan, was a well-known CBC announcer.

Saul himself worked as an accountant and found fulfilment as a volunteer.

A social reformer and NDP supporter, Cowan's unorthodox ideas are evident in his book. Instead of formal religious beliefs, he says his concept of God is closely linked to a community which helps its members in need.

As a man who helped lead North York schools through their biggest period of expansion, Cowan has lost none of the educator's zeal, but today's politics baffle him.

"People do not seem to be able to compromise, to make poverty a thing of the past and give hope to people in need."

He writes in personal and affectionate terms of his first wife, the former Lillian Rosenthal; of their two children, Michael, a physics teacher at Vanier Community College in Montreal, and Trudy, a community and Heritage activist in Calgary; and of his present wife, the former Libbie Aiken.

He says that after World War II, he and his brothers decided to change their name from Cohen because of prejudice against Jews.

He paid his way through the University of Toronto by working at the Jewish Boys Club after school ($25 a month) and at their summer camp ($125 for the season).

It was a long walk to their home from the university. But his brother Woolf did even better, he writes. A cutter at Tip Top Tailors by day, Woolf pased his senior matriculation (Grade 13) without even entering a classroom, studying at home or on the street car.

His oldest sister, Kate, now living in New York, went to work early to help support the family, a contribution Cowan says he will never forget. His other sisters, Rivka and Jeanne, live in Florida.

Saul and Lillian were married in 1932, but continued to live separately with their own parents, because only unmarried women could hold city social work jobs and they needed her salary. However, someone "snitched," she lost her job and they moved in together to two rooms.

In 1954, running for deputy reeve of North York, Cowan lost his first bid for public office by 400 votes. But he was elected as a trustee to the North York Board of Education two years later and then re-elected by ballot or by acclamation for the next 20 years.

Readers may be surprised to learn that Cowan, who spent nearly every waking moment on serious subjects, entertained at hospitals and nursing homes as a clown, with other members of B'nai Brith Manor Lodge.

One chapter of the book is devoted to Morris and Celia Rosenthal's Wapaska Lodge in Muskoka, which operated as a family holiday resort between 1948 and 1965. Financially, the project was no great shakes, Cowan writes, but it was a success in promoting friendships and family values, as its alumni (including this writer) will testify.

Bob Rae to present first Lenkinski Memorial Lecture

Louis Lenkinski

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Former Ontario premier Bob Rae will give the first Louis Lenkinski Memorial Lecture on Human Rights in December to coincide with International Day for Human Rights.

Rae was a close friend of the doughty labor leader who died suddenly a year ago after a lifetime of fighting for the rights of the working class.

Lenkinski worked so tirelessly for human rights, including Jewish causes, that the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) set up the lecture series under the chairmanship of Rabbi Jordan Pearlson.

CJC is conducting a limited financial campaign to ensure success of the lecture series; charitable tax receipts will be issued.

In these days of budgetary cutbacks, donations are vital to keep up the work to which Louis Lenkinski devoted his life, Rabbi Pearlson said. Describing him as a "minuscule giant," Rabbi Pearlson said the diminutive unionist fought against injustice wherever he found it.

"It is entirely appropriate that the lecture series be devoted to furthering the causes for which he worked so hard," the rabbi said.

"Louis was guided by the dignity he believed was due everyone, Jew and non-Jew, white, black, male or female, all deserved to be treatd with kindness, equality, justice and respect," said Bernie Farber, CJC's national director of community relations.

Among his many other posts, Lenkinski was chair of the Ontario region's community relations committee at the time of his death.

London JNF dinner honors survivors

By SUSAN MERSKEY
CJN Correspondent

LONDON, Ont. — Close to 350 people attended the recent 1996 Negev Dinner held in the Great Hall at the University of Western Ontario.

The event honored 43 Holocaust survivors, and silent tribute was paid to others no longer living, who had made their homes in London. It also celebrated Jerusalem 3000.

Keynote speaker Rabbi Dow Marmur, senior rabbi at Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto, who is himself a Holocaust survivor, paid tribute to London for the choice of honorees, and praised the work of the JNF.

Every Holocaust survivor who has rebuilt his or her life has demonstrated the enduring power of Judaism, he said. Through remembering the past and affirming the present, we are trying to safeguard the future.

Sue Barnes, MP for London West and Dianne Cunnigham, MPP for London North, brought greetings on behalf of the federal and provincial governments. Mayor Dianne Haskett, who, with her husband, took part in the recent Jewish National Fund (JNF) MegaTour to Israel, brought greetings from City Council and on her own behalf.

Musical interludes were provided by the Temple Israel Youth Choir, violinist Henry Krichker, and Cantor Joseph Freiman of Congregation Or Shalom, who was accompanied on the flute by Noam Chernick.

The funds raised at this year's dinner are being directed to Yad LaYeled, an education centre established in memory of the 1½ million Jewish children who perished in the Holocaust.

Gala to mark shul's 30th

LONDON, Ont. — Congregation Beth Tefilah is celebrating its 30th anniversary with a gala evening on Oct. 20.

In 1966, a small group met to discuss the formation of a minyan that would offer the London community an Orthodox alternative to the services then available.

The first service was held on Shabbat Chazon 5726 (July 23, 1966) at the home of Isaac Moskowitz.

The High Holy Days were celebrated that year in a rented hall and were conducted by Rabbi Harry Shapiro. About 50 people attended.

With the help of Rabbi Morton Green, who was consulted about the formation of a more permanent congregation, six members of the minyan provided the funds to purchase a piece of land with a small building that became the first home of the Beth Tefilah.

Under the spiritual leadership of Rabbi Abraham Mandelbaum, the first rabbi of the synagogue, the congregation grew to the point where they decided to undertake the building of a sanctuary.

The synagogue's first members were older, many of them Holocaust survivors who did not believe that young people would be attracted to an Orthodox setting. They were wrong. A number of young people, mainly from the University of Western Ontario, were attracted to the more traditional service.

Beth Tefilah has maintained a regular schedule of traditional daily, Shabbat and holiday services, under the guidance of several spiritual leaders and boards of directors headed first by the late Isaac Moskowitz, and then by Ralph Waldman, Morris Friedman, Harry Tugender, Stanley Sober, Monte Caplan, Mervyn Sherebrin and Abraham Santopino.

As part of its 30th anniversary, the congregation is producing a souvenir brochure and would like to include greetings from as many former congregants as possible.

Hamilton Bonds to honor mother and daughter

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — For the second year in a row, Hamilton State of Israel Bonds Women's Division will honor a mother and daughter at its gala luncheon — Zelda Rostoker and Fay Schmerling.

The fifth of seven children born to Nachama and Moshe Nekrich in Starodorogi, Russia, Rostoker was 11 when she joined the Hashomer Hatzair Zionist youth group.

In 1928, at the age of 16, she came to Hamilton to join a sister already here, and before long was involved in a local Zionist group, a Jewish theatre group and Pioneer Women, now Na'amat. She also became one of the leading advocates for Jewish education for every Jewish child in the community.

In 1932, she married the late Morris Rostoker, who had spent several years in Palestine before immigrating to Canada in 1930. They had two sons and two daughters.

Rostoker is a past president of Lillian Shekter chapter, Pioneer Women, served as a representative on the Council of Jewish Organizations and as a captain for the United Jewish Welfare Fund campaign. She is a volunteer with the sick and visiting committee of Beth Jacob sisterhood.

Fay Schmerling (left) and Zelda Rostoker are to be honored by Hamilton State of Israel Bonds Women's Division.

An avid and gifted craft worker, she donates much of her work to Anna Herscowitz chapter of Hadassah-WIZO and to Shalom Village, where she has been a volunteer for the past 13 years. Rostoker is a grandmother of 10 and this year became a great-grandmother.

A graduate of the Hamilton Teachers' College, Fay Schmerling taught public school for several years until the birth of the first of her two daughters in 1967.

But her interest in education was evident earlier. Still in her teens, she began working at the JCC on Sunday children's programs, at Camp Kadimah and at Beth Jacob Hebrew School, where she has been teaching for the past 22 years.

Schmerling is also involved in Beth Jacob sisterhood and State of Israel Bonds and is a past chair of United Jewish Appeal Women's Division.

The luncheon takes place Sept. 5 at noon at Adas Israel Synagogue. The guest speaker will be Polish-born survivor and author of All But My Life, Gerda Weissman Klein. The story of her rescue from the Germans by a U.S. intelligence officer whom she subsequently married was made into a documentary entitled You Are Free, which received an Academy award in 1996.

Winnipeg doctor hoping to establish new yeshivah

By MYRON LOVE
Special to the CJN

WINNIPEG – Dr. Gerald Minuk, one of Canada's leading liver specialists, is tackling a matter of the soul rather than the body in his current efforts to establish a yeshivah here.

Although Minuk is working in conjunction with the Chabad movement, the yeshivah would be open to the whole Jewish community.

Minuk sees the yeshivah as a step forward in re-establishing Winnipeg's reputation as a centre for Jewish religious learning. Both he and Rabbi Avraham Altein, spiritual leader of the Ashkenazi Synagogue (where Minuk is a regular attender) and head of the Lubavitch Centre, envisage a yeshivah program that would attract students from across western Canada.

Locations being scouted

The fundraising vehicle for the Yeshivah project is the Max Minuk Yeshiva Fund which was established last spring by the Minuk Family in honor of the 75th birthday of Gerry Minuk's father. (The elder Minuk passed away last Pesach after a lengthy illness.) The Minuk Family have long been supporters of the Ashkenazi Synagogue (the last of the old North Winnipeg shuls) and Chabad. The fund was initially intended to provide scholarships for Winnipeg students wishing to attend a yeshivah elsewhere. It has evolved into a fund to raise money for a yeshivah in Winnipeg as well. Several thousand dollars have already been raised, Minuk reports.

He has already been in contact with interested people in Edmonton, Calgary and Vancouver and he visited a yeshivah in Ottawa to learn about its program. Locations for a site for the yeshivah are being scouted.

Within the next month or so, a committee is being established to determine short and long term funding prospects.

One source of funding will be Mayer Zev Enterprises (Mayer Zev was Max Minuk's Yiddish name), founded by Gerry Minuk last year originally to market a computer program for liver diseases which he developed with a British colleague. The program, whose aim is to help general practitioners identify and monitor some forms of liver disease, is being marketed worldwide.

The company has also taken on the marketing of several other medical software programs developed by scientists around the world. Minuk is pledging 10 per cent of the company's earnings to the yeshiva project.

Presently, according to Rabbi Altein, plans are underway for the development of a summer yeshivah program here next summer while fund raising continues for a full scale yeshivah - perhaps as early as the fall of 1998. The summer program would offer a combination study of Talmud, Shulchan Aruch and Jewish thought. Adult students, as well as teens would be welcomed. A full scale yeshivah would include a full range of English subjects.

Jewish attractions listed

MONTREAL – Jewish Information Referral Service (JIRS) has launched a guide to Jewish Montreal which lists many of the city's synagogues, kosher restaurants and popular Jewish and non-Jewish attractions.

Designed mainly for visitors to Montreal, the free guide will also prove useful to locals looking to learn more about the city's rich Jewish heritage.

"We didn't want to duplicate information that is already available in the city's tour books, so we put together something that focuses on Montreal's Jewish sites and caters to the particular needs of the Jewish traveller," said Iselott Gasman, chair of JIRS.

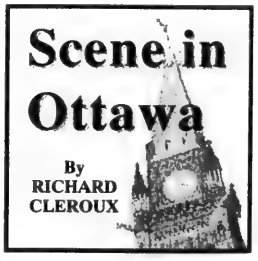
Gasman says the guide was prompted by the numerous calls JIRS volunteers receive each year from out-of-towners looking for information about the city.

The guide lists synagogues located near hotels so that observant Jews can attend services.

Also included are lists of kosher restaurants and bakeries, Jewish bookshops, stores that sell religious artifacts and even a pair of kosher bed-and-breakfasts. Jewish sites listed include the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre, the YM-YWHA Jewish Community Centre and the 80-year-old Jewish Public Library.

Of particular interest to both out-of-town tourists and local Montrealers is a map of landmarks in the old Jewish neighborhood bounded by Park Avenue to the west, St. Denis Street to the east, St. Viateur Street to the north and Pine Avenue to the south.

The guide is available at the JIRS office on the ground floor of Cummings House, 5151 Cote Ste. Catherine Rd. Telephone orders are accepted Mondays to Fridays from 9:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. by calling 514-737-2221 or toll-free, 1-888-CJA-JIRS.



Richard Cléroux is on holiday and will return in two weeks.

Hunt is on for athletes for the 'Jewish Olympics'

TORONTO — With the Atlanta Olympics over, it's time to start thinking about the Jewish Olympics, or the Maccabiah Games as it is more commonly known.

Maccabi Canada is on the hunt for top Jewish athletes for the team it expects to send to the 15th Maccabiah Games in Israel next summer, July 14 to 24.

Tryouts for a variety of sports are just around the corner, with the month of September action-filled for young Jewish athletes.

Many will try out under the watchful eyes of nationally and internationally-known coaches, a fact that Bob Luxenberg, captain of the '97 team, points to with pride. "We went all-out to recruit the best coaches," he says.

The hockey team will be coached by Jacques Demers, former coach of the Detroit Red Wings and Montreal Canadiens and winner of a Stanley Cup ring with the '93 Habs.

Victor Zilberman, a former Canadian Olympic coach, will lead the wrestling team while the basketball team will be coached by John Dore, head basketball man at Concordia University and coach of the national team at the 1995 World University Games.

Other top-ranked coaches include: Daniel Berthelette, winner of national championships in waterpolo; Joseph Hulka, who coached the women's gymnastics team at the 1987 Pan American Games; and Bill Gate, co-head coach of the Pointe Claire Swim Club.

Shul to honor longtime member

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Temple Anshe Sholom congregation will host a tribute dinner on Sept. 8 in honor of longtime shul member Al Berns.

Born and raised in an Orthodox home in Toronto, Berns and his wife, the former Ruby Yaffe of Hamilton, settled here in 1948. Ruby was a member of Temple Anshe Sholom and they joined as a couple. Before long. both were involved in every aspect of synagogue life.

As a building committee member when Anshe Sholom was planning its new building on Cline Avenue North, Berns has his name on the cornerstone, laid in 1951.

Ever since, he has looked after the temple as though it were his own. He knows every nook and cranny of the building, every pipe, duct and switch, sees to it that the boiler is kept in good repair year round and that the heating and air conditioning work. He looks after social hall rentals and wedding and bar mitzvah arrangements and other functions, makes sure the requisite number of tables and chairs are set up, that all necessary props, lighting and sound equipment are in place and in working order and looks after funerals and the cemetery.

And since he joined the chevra kadisha some 20 years ago, he is familiar with the plans of the other three Jewish cemeteries.

"I look after the living and the dead," Berns says.

He has taught Hebrew at the temple religious school and when necessary, taken a class for Rabbi Bernard Baskin, Rabbi Emeritus. On the High Holy Days, Berns is head usher and he has volunteered with UJA campaigns and helped on JNF Negev Dinners.

Long retired from his job as plant manager with Kent Steel, Berns will be 81 next January. It's time for someone younger to take over — preferably, he hopes, a volunteer, who, like himself, will do whatever he can "so that the temple doesn't have to pay for it."

Ruby has also served as a volunteer and worked as the Temple secretary for 18½ years.

Scholarship fund nearing $2 M mark

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Corresondent

VICTORIA — The Rabin Scholarship Fund for the Advancement of Peace is nearing the $2 million mark, according to Stephen Lipper, national president of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University (CHFU), which sponsors the fund.

Five major meetings have been held to date — in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Vancouver and Victoria — to promote the fund, Lipper told The CJN at a press conference at the Empress Hotel. Gifts have been made by 3,000 contributors.

Leah Rabin was the principal speaker in Montreal and Toronto; a video of her talk was shown in Winnipeg; and Rabin's daughter, Dalia Pelosoff, was the special guest at the West Coast. Attendance in Montreal and Toronto was about 1,000 in each city, while 170 turned out in Vancouver and 125 in Victoria.

Lipper emphasized that the scholarship is strictly a Canadian project, conceived by the CFHU after lengthy discussions with the president of the Hebrew University. A $2-million fund earning an average of eight percent interest will provide about $150,000 per annnum for scholarships. Capital will be held in perpetuity.

The fund will not be used to set up another faculty. Scholarship winners from around the world will be able to study for a year at Hebrew University in their own disciplines, such as economics, law, environment and conservation.

At least one scholarship winner a year must be a Canadian, Lipper said. The scholarships will begin with the 1977-98 university term. One post-graduate student selected as especially outstanding will be termed the Rabin Scholar of the year.

Lipper said scholarships will be awarded to students of all nationalities and religions, anywhere in the world where the borders are open to Israelis.

Lipper said Hebrew University is currently welcoming students from Arab countries, a good number of them Palestinians. Two are from Jordan.

Lt.-Gov. visits Jewish camp

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — Jim Kinley made a triumphant return to Camp Kadimah recently, after an absence of more than 53 years.

The last time Kinley used Lake William in Lunenburg County, N.S., where Camp Kadimah is located, was in 1942 when the area was a guides' camp. This time Kinley visited as lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia, the first time a Nova Scotia vice-regal representative has come to the camp.

"He and Mrs. Kinley had a marvelous time. We couldn't get him to leave — not that we wanted to," said Jon Goldberg, executive director of Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC), who helped host the visit.

The Kinleys, who live in Government House in Halifax during their five-year term, but whose full-time home is in Lunenberg County, arrived in the late morning for a swim in Kadimah's pool. They had lunch with the campers and staff, who greeted them with Heveinu Sholom Aleichem, and visited various areas of Kadimah, including the cultural and arts and crafts centres.

THE DOCTOR DOESN'T WORRY

The doctor was checking up on the health of his patient.

"Fine, fine! Mr. Cohen! You're doing much better," he consoled him after completing his examination. "Your general condition is improved. There is only one thing that doesn't look so good – your floating kidney. But that doesn't worry me a bit!"

"And if you had a floating kidney, do you think I'd worry about it?" snapped back Mr. Cohen.

Professor's memoir regales with incredible tales

By MAURICE LUCOW
Special to The CJN

VICTORIA — A seance with Mussolini, a visit with Ethiopian Emperor Haile Selassie, taking a convoy through Arab lines during the Israeli War of Independence. These were some of the adventures of retired University of Victoria (UVic) professor Shlomo Efrat.

Efrat has written about his experiences in his autobiographical book, The Black Shofar, whose name comes from the author's World War II visit to Aleppo, Syria, where the local rabbi asked him to take a 2,000-year-old shofar to Jerusalem.

The story was first included in an anthology prepared by members of a Jewish Community Centre creative writing class.

"The reaction to my piece on the shofar was an inducement to put in writing a number of other personal experiences and the book is the result," says Efrat.

Unusual things just seemed to happen when Efrat was on the scene. A corporal in the British army and later an officer in the newly formed Israeli army, Efrat was attending the University of Rome and acting as secretary with the delegation of the Jewish Agency to Italy in 1946.

He was staying at a guest house in Milan where one daughter, Maria, talked to spirits, especially her dead boy friend Willy who had been killed in World War II.

One night when she was speaking to Willy's spirit, Efrat was invited to watch. He joined in the conversation and says he was reasonably convinced after questioning Willy that Willy was indeed speaking truthfully and that this was no figment of the imagination.

Efrat asked Willy if Mussolini was available and when Il Duce spoke up, Efrat asked: "Is your friend Hitler there?"

"Don't you dare call him my friend," was the angry reply, Efrat reports. "My falling in with him was the greatest stupidity and mistake of my career. I engaged in ventures we couldn't afford and I turned against faithful Jewish Italians, many of whom died. Hitler is alive and in Argentina."

Maria served as the medium throughout, using a deep masculine voice, and she spoke well, despite the fact that she was uneducated and could barely speak Italian.

Efrat had asked Mussolini for some proof of their conversation and he was promised "a sign." This came shortly afterward, when an Italian newspaper headlined the news that "Hitler is alive and seen in Argentina."

The State of Israel was barely two weeks old when Efrat was assigned to organize a mission to Israel of Italian leaders. The mission he arranged included a senator, papal nobility and journalists. Efrat took them in a motor convoy, first to Haifa and then, armed with a letter from Moshe Sharett, the acting minister of foreign affairs, to Tel Aviv and then to Jerusalem, on a road blockaded by Arabs.

The senator's lead car carried the Italian flag. The convoy was stopped at Latrun, but Sharett's letter convinced an Arab official to let them through — he even invited them all in for coffee. Israeli troops at the entrance to Israel-occupied Jerusalem could scarcely believe the group had made it.

In 1964, Efrat was in Addis Ababa, capital of Ethiopia, and joined a crowd waiting to see Emperor Haile Selassie. Efrat had his camera ready and an official approached him. The photographer had not turned up to get a photo of the Emperor receiving flowers from a little blind girl. Although a very amateur photographer, Efrat agreed to take some pictures and was introduced to Haile Selassie.

"He invited me, in French, to walk with him, asked about Canada and spoke of his stay in Jerusalem when Ethiopia was occupied by the Italians," Efrat writes.

While still in the British army, in 1944, he was in Taranto, where he was introduced to the Bishop of Lucera to discuss Hebrew and to translate Hebrew tombstone inscriptions discovered by the church in a Jewish cemetery nearby.

The Bishop asked Efrat to take a letter to Pope Pius XII (Rome had just been liberated). When the Pope's secretary accepted the letter, Efrat could see him through an open door. Asked if he wanted to meet the Pope, Efrat declined because he felt he was not dressed properly — wearing khaki shorts, boots and putties. But the Pope blessed him from his office.

Efrat's book reads like an adventure novel, the story of a man who has led a fascinating life — truly a "wandering Jew."

He was born in Germany and joined his father in what was then Palestine in 1933. When World War II broke out, he enlisted in the Jewish Infantry Brigade of the British army. Demobilized in 1945, he soon after joined the IDF.

After completing service with the Israeli forces, he got his BA in political science and MA in government at American universities. He got his PhD at UVic in 1962, joined the faculty and taught there until 1989.

Just released, The Black Shofar retails at $11 (paperback) and can be ordered from Efrat's Publishing Co., Carmel Publishing, 4461 Arsens Place, Victoria, B.C. V8N 3T7. Phone or fax 604-477-8783.

Tribute for Beliveau

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Montreal Canadiens hockey legend Jean Beliveau treated his recent tribute dinner by the Maccabi Canada organization with much the same style that defined a dazzling and classy career.

With more than a little mist in the eyes, Beliveau deflected the honors with much the same finely-honed technique that he used to use to deftly redirect a pass.

"We are here not only for me, but to support a great cause," were the words chosen by an obviously moved Beliveau to summarize what made him decide to return to the Maccabi Games in Israel next summer as chef de mission of the Canadian team.

The first time was in 1985. And as Beliveau recalled both in his recent memoirs and to the over 400 tribute dinner guests at the Queen Elizabeth Hotel, the glorious memories have remained firmly ingrained in his being, especially the march of athletes into Ramat Gan Stadium.

"To live that great experience was like no other," Beliveau remembered. "Let me assure you your money is being well spent."

The dinner was thrown not only to honor Beliveau for his strong support for the organization, but to act as a public relations and fund-raising springboard for Maccabi Canada's most ambitious participation at the games ever.

Survivor family's story told in one-woman show

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The Waltonsteins, a one-woman production about a family that became dysfunctional as a result of the Nazi persecutions, will be presented by local actor Frannie Sheridan at the Norman Rothstein Theatre in the Jewish Community Centre, from Aug. 25 to Sept. 5.

Sheridan, who also wrote the play, tells about her survivor parents who met and married in Canada and raised their children as Catholics because the father was convinced the next holocaust would be in Canada. She and her six brothers and sisters were warned repeatedly never to tell anyone they were Jewish and family members threatened her with legal action when they learned she was going to reveal the family secret in the theatre, she says.

"But I finally found my voice and I feel I've come home."

Sheridan was a daughter of Bernie Sigal and Leisel Zwienicki. In 1939, Sigal, a doctor born and raised in Austria, escaped to Switzerland after learning that his parents had been taken by the Nazis in a roundup of Austrian homes. He was interned for three years in Switzerland before emigrating to Canada.

Zwienicki, the mother, was at the family home in Bremen during Kristallnacht when her mother was murdered. She, too, managed to get to Canada, where she eventually met and married Sigal.

The young couple went to work in Saskatchewan after the war, but one evening local anti-Semites broke into Sigal's office and beat him up.

By the time Sheridan was born, the family lived in Ottawa where the father was a noted eye surgeon — they had changed their name to Sheridan. The parents had decided that to protect the children, no one must know they were Jewish. The kids were baptised and sent to a Catholic school.

Sheridan didn't learn about her identity until she was nine. Only one brother had admitted he was Jewish and he became a rabbi. None of the other siblings shared her return to their Jewish roots.

The mother, who died in 1988, came back to Judaism before her death and asked to be buried in a Jewish cemetery, with the rabbi son conducting the service. The father had moved back to Vienna in 1976, continuing to hide his Jewishness.

This sad story is told by Sheridan, who plans to expand it into a full-blown play.

The Waltonsteins is being produced by the Canadian Department of Heritage and the Vancouver Holocaust Centre.

'Shameful' policies documented

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Nothing To Be Written Here, a 47-minute Holocaust video, written, directed and produced by Wendy Oberlander, recently premiered at the Pacific Cinematheque, before being shown daily at the Vancouver Art Gallery.

"Nothing To Be Written Here examines a chapter in the shameful wartime record of Canada's imigration policies," Oberlander told The CJN in a phone interview. "It marks a significant moment in the Jewish Diaspora in the 20th century."

Mixing personal narration and historical documentary, the video traces Oberlander's discovery of her father's wartime experiences. Exiled from Austria in 1938, interned in Britain and then transferred to Canada in 1940, her father was one of over 2,000 German and Austrian refugees held in internment camps near Montreal along with Nazi prisoners of war.

The camp was described by Canadian authorities as a place for "dangerous, enemy aliens" and internees were treated like PoWs, despite efforts of Canadian Jewish Congress and other Jewish organizations to free them.

Oberlander says that "public and private silence surrounding the scandalous story compelled me to examine my inheritance, leading me to public archives, unpublished memoirs and former internees."

The result is a documentary that incorporates a historical narration, a personal narration and her father's memories, plus visits to former camp sites in Eastern Canada. A layering of film and video images — handwritten letters, fire, a boat and a suitcase, build on the stories that Oberlander has developed from her extensive research.

Oberlander is a producer of multimedia productions whose work has been shown in Canada, Iceland and the United States.

Nothing To Be Written Here was funded in part by the explorations program of the Canada Council, the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, the Jewish Community Foundation of Greater Montreal and the National Film Board.

The video won first place in a Holocaust biography contest held by the Judah L. Magner Museum in Berkeley, Calif.

The video is showing in Vancouver as part of the art gallery's show, Aspects of B.C. Arts. It runs until Jan. 12, 1997.

For distribution information contact Wendy Oberlander at 2635 East Fifth Ave., Vancouver, V5M 1N1; phone 604-255-9557; fax 604-730-1551.

Quebec patriarch's story no dry genealogical tract

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

About six years ago, Montrealer Anne Joseph spent two days researching and compiling a brief history and family tree of the illustrious Joseph family for her husband Bill and his five children, on the occasion of his 70th birthday.

"I thought that would be the end of it, but instead it was only the beginning," says Joseph, whose family and a Quebec City publisher urged her to start a much larger study of the Joseph family.

The result is Heritage Of A Patriarch, a 562-page book that outlines the genealogy and history of this pioneering Jewish family that has lived for 10 generations in Montreal. The patriarch of the title is Henry Joseph (1775-1832), who settled in Montreal in 1790 and founded the merchandising firm Joseph & Co., which operated until 1956.

One of the earliest Jewish families in Montreal, the Josephs were entwined through marriage with other early Jewish families with surnames like David, de Sola, Franks, Hart, Hays, Judah, Pinto and Solomons. Oddly, although Joseph's book contributes substantially to our knowledge of early Canadian Jewry and its links to well-known personages in the United States and England, she says it has aroused more interest outside of Canada. In recent months, she has been invited to speak to groups in Tel Aviv and Boston.

A Sephardi Jew, Henry Joseph evidently came to Montreal from England, but the family's history before then is cloudy.

"We think they came from Spain and travelled through Portugal, France, Holland and England before coming to Canada, but we can't prove it," Joseph says.

Besides utilizing many archival documents from various sources, she used diaries, letters and four large boxes of private family papers that her husband had inherited.

Consequently, Heritage Of A Patriarch reads more like an intriguing historical account than a series of dry genealogical charts. The book contains dozens of illustrations.

As Joseph shows, various present-day members of Montreal's historic Shearith Israel Synagogue, including Bill Joseph, are direct descendents of the founding families of 1768. Another distinction is that the Josephs are one of few Jewish families with a family crest. The crest depicts numerous sheaves of wheat, evidently a symbol of the biblical tribe of Joseph, and bears a latin inscription which translates as "Both the Honor and the Reward of Integrity."

Pioneering Jewish family

The British-born Joseph, who has lived in Montreal for most of her adult life, laments the political changes that have reduced the city's Jewish community and notes that three of her five stepchildren have moved away permanently. Ironically, her publisher, Denis Vaugeois, is an ardent separatist who served as a cabinet minister in the PQ government of Rene Levesque.

"Our political views are diametrically opposed," says Joseph, "but we're still good friends and he's passionately interested in the Hart and Joseph families."

Now that Heritage Of A Patriarch is in print, Joseph has started her next project, a biography of Alan Rose, the former executive vice-president of Canadian Jewish Congress who died in 1995. The project, says Joseph, has the blessing of Congress.

Published by Editions du Septentrion in Quebec City, Heritage Of A Patriarch is available in bookstores or from the author by phoning 514-487-1214.

UJA Federation spreads community message

The upcoming UJA Federation annual campaign will be something to beleive in. Radio, billboards, print ads, and videos will feature Jewish Torontonions proclaiming their belief in community and what UJA Federation does to bring the community together.

"We've put together a really great marketing team this year devoting a lot of energy and creativity to the campaign," explains Campaign Chairman David Goldstein.

UJA Federation raises money to fund, among other services, financial assistance for the poor, Toronto's Jewish education system and rescue of Jews in distress anywhere in the world.

Deep government spending cuts and rising demand for social services have led to increased pressure on UJA Federation and its beneficiary agencies.

The We Believe marketing strategy is based on research showing how much people care about the Jewish community and want to belong. "UJA Federation offers that sense of belonging," explains Carole Sterling, a member of the Vision Cabinet whose leadership is a key element in getting the message across.

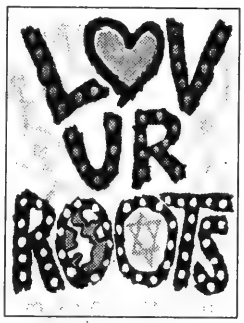
1997 Campaign launch rooted in community

By Elyse Adams

The entire Jewish community is invited to get back to their roots and express their belief in community as UJA Federation kicks off its 1997 campaign at a gala launch party on August 26.

This year's community campaign launch at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, will feature a multimedia presentation hosted by actor Al Waxman with live theatre and music from Israeli recording artists Shorashim, and the premiere of UJA Federation's new campaign video Keep the Fire Burning...Chapter Two.

"It's a contemporary 90's sort of thing that's high energy and perfect for the entire family," says Debbie Kimel, a veteran UJA Federation leader who is co-chairing the event along with Michael Budman and Don Green. Kimel says she "hopes to get those who are unaffiliated more involved."



"Most of us have always felt it has been our parents' responsibility. Now it's time for us to carry on to the next generation. By remembering our roots, we are going to take on that responsibility."

Roots are understandably important to Michael Budman and Don Green, co-founders of Roots Canada. The company has commissioned special T-shirts for the occasion that will be sold in selected stores across Metro Toronto. All proceeds from T-shirt sales will go to UJA Federation.

The 1997 UJA Federation Campaign Launch takes place Monday August 26 at 8:00 pm at the Ford Centre for Performing Arts, in the George Weston Recital Hall. Seating is limited and organizers have no doubt the event will sell out quickly. Tickets are $15 in advance, $20 at the door. For more information or to order tickets call (416) 631-5700.

David Goldstein,
UJA Federation 1997 Campaign Chairman

"While the need has always been great within the community, government budget cuts have made this year's campaign all about the survival of our community infrastructure. The threat is great and real. Losing these essential services and programs will tremendously weaken one of the most unique and recognized Jewish communities in the world.

Our main goal is to make the community aware of our most valuable assets: people, programs and agencies funded by UJA Federation."

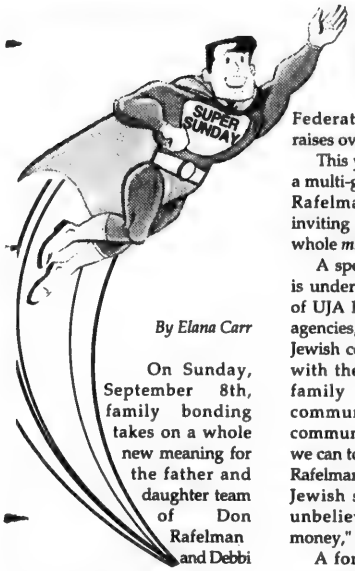
Super team for Super Sunday



By Elana Carr

On Sunday, September 8th, family bonding takes on a whole new meaning for the father and daughter team of Don Rafelman and Debbi Stern. They're co-chairs of Super Sunday for UJA Federation's 1997 annual campaign.

Super Sunday is a one day telethon at which hundreds of volunteers call thousands of households on behalf of UJA Federation. It traditionally raises over $2 million.

This year's Super Sunday has a multi-generational theme and Rafelman and Stern are inviting volunteers to bring the whole mishpacha.

A special recruitment effort is underway to enlist the help of UJA Federation beneficiary agencies, synagogues and large Jewish corporations in keeping with the campaign theme of family and belief in community. "We, as a community, must do all that we can to help each other," says Rafelman. "Numerous essential Jewish services require and unbelievable amount of money," he adds.

A former UJA Federation Chairman, Rafelman, who has been involved with UJA Federation since the mid-1950's, has always stressed the importance of Jewish values to his children. "Our family believes that UJA Federation is the central important Jewish fundraising organization and we recognize the importance of demonstrating our commitment to Israel, as well as to our local Jewish community."

In 1988, Rafelman took his daughter Debbi on a UJA Federation mission to Israel. She became emotionally involved with the country and was extremely impressed with the many projects and services supported by the UJA Federation funded Jewish Agency. Since then she has followed in her father's footsteps by taking on various leadership roles within UJA Federation.

As a full time mother, Stern is committed to serving the community and wants her children to understand the importance of her commitment. "I have grown up with a community-minded family, so when I started having children, I felt the importance of stressing Jewish values to them," she explains.

Debbi Stern and Don Rafelman

Rafelman says he is exceptionally proud to be co-chairing Super Sunday with his daughter and hopes that by joining forces they inspire other families to become connected to the community and UJA Federation. "People in my generation need to see other dedicated families and I truly hope that other families will follow our lead," says Stern.

More volunteers are needed to help staff the phones and perform other supportive tasks throughout the day. Super Sunday will be followed by a Super Week, September 9-12. Training sessions for telephone campaigners will be offered, as well as day-long prizes. For additional information on how to make your Sunday, September 8th a SUPER SUNDAY, please contact Elliot Halperin at (416) 631-5734.

Mission shines spotlight on Israel

By Zameret Kleiman

The UJA Federation Arts & Entertainment Division will soon be showing Israel in a unique light. The division's upcoming Spotlight on Israel Mission, October 22-29, will provide both an Israel experience and an insider's look at the country's growing A&E industry.

The Mission, celebrating Jerusalem's 3000th anniversary, includes special briefings and a reception with Israeli arts and entertainment professionals. Mission participants will also be able to witness first hand the success of UJA Federation funded projects.

"Spotlight on Israel provides an opportunity for representatives from all sectors of the entertainment industry to get together," says Richard Sadowski, who co-chairs the A&E division with Howard Lichtman.

"Unlike the last A&E Mission to Israel in 1988," says Lichtman, "this year's Spotlight will be a national trip which will include participants from across Canada, broadening opportunities for networking."

Tour highlights include ice skating at Canada Centre in Metulla; meeting performers, painters and musicians who have recently immigrated to Israel; confronting key political issues with journalists and residents of the Golan and settlements in the territories; and deluxe accommodations.

To reflect the Mission's national scope a planning committee has been created composed of leading A&E figures: Howard Lichtman, Richard Sadowski, Irene Berkowitz, Paul Bronfman, Lawrie Fein, Michael Goldberg, Allen Karp, Allan Krasnick, Michael Levine, David Novek, Joel Reitman, Richard Ross, Leonard Schein, Maurice Tietolman and Ron Robins, Chair of CJA Federation's Communications Division in Montreal. According to Robins, "we have been receiving tremendous feedback about the mission and its cross country scope."

There is an optional excursion to Jordan from Oct. 29-30, featuring visits to Petra, Amman, Jerash, Madaba and Mt. Nebo.

For more information contact Paul Marcus at (416) 631-5729 or 1-888-635-2424.

Spotlight on Israel mission participants will be visiting UJA Federation funded Project Renewal sites such as this daycare facility in Eilat that Cheryl Wortzman toured earlier this year.

The right move

By Steve Sivan

Twelve year old Igor Saharov gingerly fiddles with his jacket as he tries to pull the sleeve over his limp right arm. It's been nearly two years since a bullet pierced his shoulder and neck as a result of civil war in his home town of Tiraspol, Moldova.

Igor and his parents, Alla and Valerie, were airlifted out of Moldova to Israel along with a group of other Jewish families by the UJA Federation funded Jewish Agency in early March.

"We could simply no longer go on living in Moldova," Alla says. "We endured too much suffering since the collapse of the Soviet Union. Mafia-style gangs have taken control of the streets and the authorities are too weak to deal with them."

Igor and Alla Saharov

Igor fell victim to the chaos two years ago as he walked home after a football game. A stray bullet, fired in a gun duel between warring gangs, hit him where the shoulder and neck meet.

"He was completely paralyzed for months," recalls Alla, "but a combination of physiotherapy and surgery was able to bring back the use of most of his body except his right arm."

Alla admits that her primary motivation in immigrating to Israel was to provide her son with access to proper medical treatment. "But now that we are here, there is no going back to Moldova," she adds. "Igor's shooting was not an isolated incident. It could happen again. I was simply not relaxed in Tiraspol. I couldn't sleep at night."

"I cannot say that we feel completely at home yet," admits Alla, "but the natural beauty of the country and the warmth of the people make me feel very optimistic about the future."

Medical problems aside, Igor is looking forward to starting school in Haifa. "I've missed the best part of two years of schooling because of my injury," says this young man whose interests are mathematics and science. "I have a lot of catching up to do and I can't wait to get on with it."

The Saharovs are just one of hundreds of thousands of families rescued from turmoil by the Jewish Agency with funding from UJA Federation in Toronto and other Federations around the world.

Ashkenazi families sought in schizophrenia study

By MIRIAM RINN
The Jewish Standard

It's everyone's secret fear: You have a perfectly normal child until one day, lightning strikes. That lightning could take the form of a speeding car, a seductive drug, or a mysterious disease.

That disease could be schizophrenia. The child you had so many hopes for could become a stranger, paralyzed by irrational fears or otherwise out of touch with reality. And you can do little or nothing to help. In fact, you wonder if you are to blame

Scientists now know that parents' behavior has nothing to do with schizophrenia, which affects one percent of the population. There may, however, be a genetic link, and researchers at the Johns Hopkins University School of Medicine (JHMI) in Baltimore have sent out a call for Ashkenazi Jews to participate in researching possible genetic roots of the disease.

Dr. Ann Pulver, an associate professor of psychiatry at the JHMI and the project's principal investigator, told the Jewish Standard that she is particularly interested in talking to Jews with large families in which there are several members who have the disease. The study involves five other institutions in the United States and Europe.

The scientists chose Jews not because there is a higher incidence of schizophrenia among them, but because Jews still tend to marry people of their own background.

"Ideally, I would like to study the more Orthodox community," Pulver explained, as they are the most likely to marry within a restricted group.

Pulver, an epidemiologist, has been studying schizophrenia since 1980. Her current study has been underwritten by the Sandoz Pharmaceuticals Corporation, manufacturers of Clozaril, a relatively new drug for the disease.

Participants in the study will be interviewed and have blood samples taken for DNA analysis. Although psychotics are often suspicious and frightened of strangers, Pulver said she has had no trouble convincing schizophrenics themselves to take part in the study, explaining that "because schizophrenics have so little opportunity to participate in society, they are eager to help." Parents will also be interviewed and have blood samples taken.

"We are looking for a biological basis for the disease," Pulver said, adding that schizophrenia is probably more than one illness.

Symptoms of schizophrenia include hallucinations, paranoia, lack of motivation, an inability to connect to other people or form attachments, and an inability to experience pleasure.

Peaks and valleys

It is a chronic and recurrent illness of peaks, valleys, and plateaus, according to social worker Menorah Rotenberg, who runs a 20-session psycho-educational workshop for the families of young adult schizophrenics at the Englewood Centre of the Community Centres for Mental Health, at 93 West Palisade Ave. in that community.

Before the development of drugs, in the '50s and '60s, to control the more bizarre symptoms, schizophrenics were routinely confined in state mental asylums. Although everyone acknowledges that modern medicines have dramatically improved the care of schizophrenics, "they have not been as transforming as we had hoped," said Rotenberg.

Even with medication, most schizophrenics are unable to hold jobs or to get along by themselves in the world.

For parents of schizophrenic children, the pain never ends, according to Rotenberg. "It is an ongoing process of grieving, oscillating between denial and acceptance."

Although many schizophrenics don't exhibit symptoms until young adulthood, some show early signs of something being wrong. One British medical study, reported in the New York Times on May 28, found that there were indeed subtle differences in those children who later became schizophrenics, overlooked by parents at the time.

"She had a difficult time relating" right from the beginning, a Bergen County Jewish woman who will be called Mrs. X told the Standard about her mentally ill daughter. After the age of 10, she got worse. A hard time in school led to a diagnosis of perceptual impairment.

"She was not very logical. She didn't seem to know consequences," said Mrs. X.

Mrs. X's daughter continued to behave more and more bizarrely as she matured. When she went away to college, she announced that she was engaged to be married. Since there was no young man and no ring, Mrs. X was uncertain, but her daughter continued to insist that she was to be married soon.

"She got kicked out [of college] after one term" and then moved from job to job. The engagement was forgotten, and despite her daughter's frequent hospitalizations at Bergen Pines, Mrs. X became hopeful that she had found some stability when she managed to keep one job for 12 years. Then a grandparent died, and the young woman became more unstable. A physical attack upon her mother in their rabbi's office made treatment imperative. But, like many mentally ill people, she refused treatment.

"When you would say something to her, she would run out," her mother recalled. Mrs. X's daughter now lives in a state-run group residence in Morris County. Ironically, she was always the most religious member of the family. "What we really need is a kosher, Jewishly-oriented residence," said Mrs. X, who lobbied for just such a home.

New herpes drug unveiled

By JUDY SIEGEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Ben-Gurion University (BGU) researchers have developed a new anti-viral ointment, based on extracts from micro-algae, that has been shown to be highly effective in lab tests against various types of herpes.

Many millions of people around the world suffer from herpes. In its herpes simplex virus (HSV) form, it attacks the skin and nervous system and produces small,short-lasting, irritating, and sometimes painful, fluid-filled blisters on the skin and mucous membranes.

Another type of the virus (HSV2) causes genital herpes, which is usually transmitted by sexual contact. This virus affects both men and women. It may be passed on from the mother's blood to the fetus or to the newborn by direct contact during birth.

Until now, the accepted treatment for herpes has been the synthetic drug acyclovir, which is meant to prevent the copying of the viral DNA. However, this drug, which is expensive, can cause side effects, and there are increasing reports of viral resistance to it.

The BGU team, headed by Prof. Shoshana Arad, director of the university's institute for applied life sciences research, included Prof. Ya'acov Tal, director of the virology department at BGU's medical school, and Dr. Mahmoud Halihal. Arad has been working on the herpes drug for over two years.

The drug, as yet unnamed, has been shown very effective against herpes in hares and mice in the lab and successfully tested at the Pasteur Institute in Paris and Hadassah-University Hospital in Jerusalem.

It will begin clinical trials soon. BGU's research and development branch has the patent and the Swiss pharmaceutical company Debiopharm has purchased the development and marketing rights.

According to the Swiss company, the ointment should be on the market within three years.

"Approval from the U.S. Food and Drug Administration and other authorities should not take too long," said Arad, "because [the oinment] is derived from a natural substance and it is used externally with no significant side effects even during long-term use."

'Dr. Fluency' aids stutterers

By SISSY BLOCK
Jerusalem Dateline

JERUSALEM, Israel — The Speech and Hearing Centre at Jerusalem's Hadassah Hospital in Ein Kerem offers a three-week intensive course for stutterers with a one year follow-up. In the course, a group of four to six participants work together to learn a new way to speak. This includes correct movement, proper breathing and use of vocal cords.

Arieh Friedman is one of many Israeli stutterers who have successfully completed this course. His experience led him to design a computer program that would be an enjoyable and interesting way for stutterers to practice what they have learned. Called "Dr. Fluency," the program is now an integral part of the hospital's stuttering therapy.

Its eye-catching graphics are highlighted by encouraging picture icons. The patients record themselves doing the exercises. Then they listen to themselves for self-evaluation and afterwards receive objective feedback from the computer. Each lesson is first taught to the group by the speech pathologist. Then the individual patients work at the computer for 20 to 40 minutes. Afterwards,they divide into pairs and practice.

Familial tendency

Why people stutter in the first place is still unclear. Stuttering is not genetic, however, there seems to be a general familial tendency to develop this impediment. It can also be an environmental reaction, which may or may not be associated with a traumatic event. Children commonly develop disfluency between the ages of two and four. In 90 percent of the cases stuttering stops naturally.

Hadassah's speech pathologists are more concerned with helping the patients live with disfluence rather than analyzing what caused it. They help stutterers learn how to work their new way of speaking into their lives, to be consistent and keep practicing. "It is important that our patients practice with each other, not only the computer, since the ultimate goal is to be able to talk comfortably with other people," says Cahtia Adelman, one of the centre's audiologist and speech pathologists.

Dr. Fluency is now being developed for home use as part of Hadassah's maintenance program. While it is too soon to determine how it will influence long term results in stutterers, there is nevertheless a relationship between how much a patient practices and how much his or her condition improves.

Peace Watch slams PA's compliance with accords

By EVELYN GORDON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Yasser Arafat's announcement in March that he was outlawing the military wings of Hamas and Islamic Jihad was never implemented; no such decree was ever published or enforced, according to a Peace Watch report published last week.

The 103-page report is an assessment of the Palestinian Authority's (PA) anti-terror activity during its first two years of existence, from May 18, 1994 to May17, 1996. The report concludes that the PA's efforts in this direction were cursory and largely failed to fulfil its obligations under the Oslo accords.

As a result, the number of Israelis killed in terror attacks during the first two years of the PA's existence (161) was 39 percent higher than the number killed in the previous two years (116).

A major portion of the report is devoted to the PA's policy on disarming and disbanding terrorist groups and weakening their infrastructure. In this section, Peace Watch noted that Arafat's declaration that certain terrorist groups would be outlawed, which he issued on March 3, 1996 in response to the wave of suicide bombings, could have been an important turning point in the PA's previous policy of inaction against such groups.

"Since Arafat's announcement, however, an exhaustive search by Peace Watch has failed to turn up any decree banning such groups, either in the Palestinian written press or in the PA's digest of laws," the report stated. "Numerous requests for a text of the presidential decree or law formally banning Hamas and Islamic Jihad have gone unanswered...As far as Peace Watch has been able to determine, no such law or decree exists, and the announcement that there would be such a law was never followed by concrete action. Moreover, the pattern of Palestinian Police action in March, April and May of 1996 indicates that they were not enforcing any such law."

The report also noted that despite periodic announcements of a crackdown against unlicensed weapons, no such crackdown ever took place. During one campaign, in May 1995, the PA confiscated only a few dozen weapons; during a second, in March-April 1996, 70 weapons were confiscated. This constitutes only a tiny fraction of the total number of illegal firearms in the PA. In Gaza alone, the number of weapons is estimated to be anywhere from 1,500 to as many as 40,000, with Arafat's assessment being 26,000, the report noted.

Furthermore, while most Hamas and Islamic Jihad activists did not register their guns, those who requested to do so were given permits.

The report also said that though the PA has conducted 16 major sweeps of terror bases resulting in more than 1,500 arrests, most of those detained were political or religious activists rather than members of the military wings, and almost all were later released. Only this spring did the PA begin arresting top Hamas leaders, and so far these arrests have not been followed by trials.

Finally, the report said, the PA has prevented some terror attacks, but far fewer than it has claimed; and it "rarely, if ever" tried the individuals involved in the thwarted attacks.

how to give an encompassing protection as we do."

Arad was speaking to mark the beginning of Home Front week. His comments came just a few weeks after the government decided that gas masks were not to be called in for maintenance next year.

Col. Arieh Ben-Shalom, head of the gas masks branch of the Home Front, said there are 5.5 million gas masks in the hands of the public and the remaining 400,000 citizens had not bothered to collect their masks. He said some 83 percent of his branch's work is devoted to maintaining gas masks already held by Israelis.

Batteries die, filters must be replaced and injections of antidotes expire. Halting this program would save about NIS120 million, Ben-Shalom said.

Arad came out in favor of the existing plan to maintain gas masks.

However, he was cautious not to get involved in a political argument, saying it was up to the government to decide the fate of the gas mask program.

Arad also said that a special project is underway to install complete safety features in Arab villages in the North. He said that during Operation Grapes of Wrath, Hezbollah broke its tradition of not shelling Israeli-Arab settlements and that every Arab village under Katyusha threat would be addressed in the coming year.

Arad said 35 percent of the population does not have access to bomb shelters or security rooms. However, he noted that this is an improvement and that the percentage is being reduced every year

Israel will close PA offices

The PA legislator had opened an office in his east Jerusalem home earlier this month to serve his constituents.

Kahalani ordered the office closed, but then settled for a declaration by Khader that the office had no connection to the PA.

Netanyahu said he was not satisfied with the agreement.

"I gave an unequivocal directive to the internal security minister to close the office of Hattem Abdel Khader...and I request that these directives be carried out," Netanyahu told the cabinet.

Canadian 'import' heads Chabad in Israel

By LEORA EREN-FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

KFAR CHABAD, ISRAEL – The red brick building, a replica of Lubavitch headquarters in Brooklyn, looks incongruous set amidst the orange groves outside Tel Aviv. But across the street from Israel's renowned "770" building, one finds another less-known import from North America: Rabbi Yosef Yitzchok Aronov, the Toronto-born head of Chabad in Israel.

Unlike the brick structure, Rabbi Aronov looks right at home in Kfar Chabad, headquarters of the Lubavitch movement in Israel. The black-bearded, bespectacled man speaks English like a native Canadian, switches easily to Hebrew, but obviously feels most comfortable talking Yiddish.

The 42-year-old Canadian was enrolled at the Lubavitch yeshivah in Montreal before moving to New York to study at the movement's world headquarters — home of the late Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson. In 1977, the Rebbe sent Rabbi Aronov to Israel, where he met and married a Kfar Chabad woman and rose quickly in the Chabad hierarchy. At age 32, he became the executive director of Chabad in Israel.

From his office, he runs a network of 200 Chabad houses, organizes airlifts for sick children from Chernobyl and launches mitzvah campaigns and educational activities throughout Israel.

From this office, Rabbi Aronov also took an unprecedented step last spring: the mass mobilization of the movement on behalf of Likud leader Benjamin (Bibi) Netanyahu in the recent election campaign.

Politics. He bristles upon hearing the word. "Why do you call our activity political?" he asks, sounding genuinely perplexed.

During the campaign, thousands of Chabad activists plastered the streets with Bibi posters. Chabad rabbis instructed followers to vote for Netanyahu. And the movement was behind one of the more controversial slogans of the campaign: "Bibi Netanyahu: It's good for the Jews."

"I don't think we voiced any political opinion," Rabbi Aronov insists.

As incredible as that denial may sound, Rabbi Aronov explains: "We took our stand for the sake of pikuach nefesh (saving lives). The Lubavitcher Rebbe has said that every security expert who is not affiliated with a political party concurs about one thing: returning land endangers life. In supporting Netanyahu, we had one thing in mind: saving lives. We backed him because he said he would not return territory. But that doesn't mean we voiced an opinion about him or Peres. That doesn't mean we acted politically."

Asked about the "unaffiliated" security experts, Rabbi Aronov mutters the name of an American expert and insists that this view is a unanimous one. He denies that Chabad's belief in holding on to all territory is based on kedushat ha'aretz — the sanctity of the land of Israel.

"There are all kinds of opinions about that question, but it was not on our agenda," he says, again reverting to the security concern, saving lives and the apolitical nature of Chabad's position.

If Netanyahu is good for the Jews, is Peres bad for the Jews? It's a question that many critics posed when Chabad came out with their slogan days before the election. Others expressed surprise at the backing of a secular candidate.

Again Rabbi Aronov is evasive. "We weren't promoting anyone. Chabad has nothing against Peres. Let's say you're sitting in shul in Crown Heights or Williamsburg and you discuss which presidential candidate would be better for the Jews. Is there anything wrong with that?"

It soon becomes clear why Rabbi Aronov is so adamant about labelling the movement's election activity "apolitical." He notes that the Hebrew word for political party (miflaga) shares the same root as the word for split (pilug).

"When I'm affiliated with one party, it means I'm split. I'm with them, not with you. And that's not what Chabad stands for. When Chabad walks into any country in the world, it reaches out to all Jews. In Israel, I can sit together with Yossi Sarid (the leader of the left-wing Meretz party). And I have sat with him. You know he visited Kfar Chabad," says Rabbi Aronov proudly. "Our goal is to reach all fellow Jews. We want to unite people. Politics stigmatizes us — it prevents unity."

Rabbi Aronov points to Chabad's newly-launched road accident prevention campaign, comparing it to the movement's stand in the elections: another effort to save lives. But if anything, the new project seems more like a balm meant to heal the divisiveness of the last campaign. There is nothing every Israeli can agree on more than the need to put an end to carnage on the roads. (The Chabad campaign urges drivers to keep charity boxes and prayer books in their cars in an effort to enlist the Almighty's protection, and calls for safe driving as a form of mitzvah or good deed.)

If there is one project that has won blanket support, uniting people as diverse as Steven Spielberg, scientists from the World Health Organization and Israel's Chief Rabbi, it is the Children of Chernobyl mission. The 6-year-old project, which has won international praise and a Knesset prize, provides medical relief to Jewish children suffering from the aftermath of the Chernobyl nuclear disaster.

Since 1990, Chabad has brought some 1,300 such children from Ukraine and Belarus to Israel in 23 airlifts. During their stay at Kfar Chabad, they receive specialized medical care (including daily diagnosis and treatment), psychological support, food, clothing and board, as well as a broad-based education. Usually parents join their children after several years and start new lives in Israel. The entire program is funded through donations.

As the initiator of the Chernobyl program, Rabbi Aronov has been involved in the entire rescue operation.

Arab states adopt wait-and-see attitude

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Pan-Arabism, big in the 1950s and 1960s, is a concept whose time appears to have passed, a phenomenon torn asunder by the exigencies of divergent political disputes, the clash of personal agendas and, of course, Iraq's 1990 invasion of Kuwait.

Mideast Analysis

But since the election of Benjamin Netanyahu as Israel's prime minister, there has been a resurgence of Arab unity.

What Arab leaders and commentators describe as Netanyahu's "three nos" — no to a Palestinian state, no to an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights and no to a division of Jerusalem — have revived the flickering flame of pan-Arabism.

Netanyahu's hard-line positions on core issues, which represent a fairly sharp departure from the policies of the previous Israeli government, have caused widespread anxiety but a wait-and-see attitude in the Arab world.

Since Netanyahu's electoral victory, the Arabs, under the leadership of Egypt, have convened two meetings and one summit in the name of peace, all held in an effort to convince Israel to hew to the land-for-peace formula enshrined in United Nations Resolution 242.

In light of past Arab resolutions hostile to Israel, the call by Arab states on Netanyahu to continue the quest for a peaceful resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict is ironic. It is a far cry from the defiant "three nos" of the 1967 Arab conference in Khartoum, which said no to negotiations with Israel, no to recognition of Israel and no to peace with Israel.

It is no secret that the Arabs were deeply disappointed by the Labor party's failure to win re-election. The Labor party had forged a rapprochement with the PLO, entered into talks with Syria, signed a peace treaty with Jordan, inaugurated low-level relations with Morocco, Tunisia, Qatar, Oman and Mauritania, and reached an understanding with the Palestinians on a blueprint for peace.

But with Likud's triumph at the polls, a new reality set in, one that the Arabs have been unable to digest.

In and of itself, Netanyahu's insistence on "peace with security" is not regarded as an insurmountable obstacle by the Arabs. They realize that Israel is as much entitled to security as they are, and they are cognizant of the fact that the Labor party ran on a similar platform — "security through peace."

What alarms Arab leaders is Netanyahu's apparent rejection of Resolution 242, his opposition to a Palestinian state and his refusal to give up the Golan or East Jerusalem. (Last week, however, Netanyahu said that he is willing to engage in talks with Syria "on all outstanding matters.")

The three principles which are at the heart of Netanyahu's policy — reciprocity, peace or terrorism and democratization of the Arab states — are widely viewed by Arabs as devices to derail the peace process. (Shimon Peres, the former prime minister, has said that these conditions "cannot be fulfilled" and are uniting the Arabs against Israel.)

Netanyahu has indeed agitated the Arab world.

•On June 5, less than a week after the Israeli election, the leaders of Egypt, Jordan and the PLO met in Cairo, and urged Netanyahu to honor commitments to the Palestinians and to accept the inevitability of a Palestinian state.

•On June 7, in Damascus, the leaders of Egypt, Syria and Saudi Arabia warned Israel not to retreat from the peace process.

•On June 23, in a summit in Cairo, 21 Arab leaders issued a declaration proclaiming their desire for peace, calling on Israel to withdraw from the territories and to permit the Palestinians to establish a sovereign state with East Jerusalem as its capital.

Responding to their communique, Netanyahu said that "one-sided demands that harm (Israel's) security are not reconcilable with peace talks."

Egypt, which signed the first Arab peace treaty with Israel and has taken the lead in exerting pressure on Netanyahu, does not believe that the Arabs are ganging up on Israel.

Last month, President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt met with Netanyahu in Cairo and then voiced optimism that "the peace process will continue." The amiable outcome of their tete-a-tete suggested that Netanyahu may have been more forthcoming in private than he has been in public so far.

But Netanyahu's apparent success at damage control in Egypt has not worked elsewhere.

King Hassan of Morocco declined to take a telephone call from Netanyahu after he was elected. And Netanyahu's request to visit the Moroccan monarch on his way home from Washington was rebuffed.

Furthermore, despite a trip by Netanyahu's foreign affairs advisor to Qatar and Oman to bolster bilateral relations, Qatar has delayed the opening of a trade office in Tel Aviv.

And since Netanyahu's accession to power, Israeli diplomats in Tunis have not been received by Tunisian officials. Israel's relations with Jordan, though, remain on a solid footing.

The Week in Israel

Aug. 5

• More than 1,700 Jewish educators from 20 countries were in Israel to attend the 21st annual Conference on Alternatives in Jewish Education.

Aug. 6

• One IDF soldier was killed and two were wounded today in the Security Zone in southern Lebanon when Hezbollah guerrillas attacked an IDF outpost with mortar fire, Kol Yisrael reported. Combat medic First Sgt. Hauho Aslan, 20, was killed rushing to tend to those wounded in the attack.

Aug. 7

• All telephone numbers in Jerusalem expanded to seven digits. The change is part of a plan to convert all telephone numbers in Israel to seven digits by the end of the year.

Aug. 8

• Israeli Justice Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman resigned after the attorney general decided to order a police investigation into allegations against him. The investigation is to focus on allegations that Ne'eman had obstructed court proceedings in a case before he became a cabinet member.

Aug. 9

• The crisis between Foreign Minister David Levy and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was said to be worsening. The prime minister said he would not give in to Levy's demands that he be appointed head of the steering committee to the talks with the Palestinians. Netanyahu said: "I was elected prime minister to promote certain policies. The Palestinian problem is the heart of the political matter and I intend running it." Levy has been noticeably absent in recent days from his ministerial office and from cabinet meetings. It was hoped by government officials that the crisis atmosphere would abate somewhat however as a result of a trip by Levy and cabinet colleague Ariel Sharon to the United States to attend a private function.

JERUSALEM 3000 EVENTS

Aug. 18 to 23: 2,500 participants were expected to attend both the Ninth International Congress of Bacteriology and Applied Microbiology Division and the Eighth International Congress of Mycology Division.

Recruits less motivated: minister

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai met with new recruits last week and came face to face with something the IDF has not admitted publicly before: There is a growing drop in the motivation to serve in combat units and the army in general.

"I think it is the beginning of a phenomenon. I don't think it is widespread, but it is enough of an indication or symptom that we, the defence establishment, the IDF, the government, educators, parents and the public, will have to do something to strengthen the motivation and desire to serve in the IDF," Mordechai said, following a visit to the IDF induction centre at Tel Hashomer.

"We have recognized this phenomenon and it is better to deal with it, instead of saying it doesn't exist."

Mordechai said he had met the evening before with about a dozen reserve brigade and battalion commanders to discuss the decreasing motivation among reservists and the increasing decline in the IDF's image among the public.

"I think a part of the public thinks that we have reached the time to rest, and some think we don't have to contribute all our efforts toward defence. We will make all efforts to convince this public that they are living under a delusion," Mordechai said.

Asking a roomful of recruits where they and their classmates wanted to serve, Mordechai seemed shocked by the reply: "The rear."

When they were asked how many in the room of more than 100 wanted to serve in combat infantry units, only three soldiers raised their hands.

"There is a reduction in motivation. Maybe it's because peace is approaching and we don't feel the need to serve or the need for a strong army," said Assaf, from Jerusalem.

Oren, from Netanya, said a good many of his classmates sought to do their service as "jobnikim" (rear echelon troops) because "it is not too difficult physically."

Mordechai tried to explain to the new soldiers the importance of being the "defensive shield" of the nation.

"We are a nation which seeks peace. But there are many nations which have not accepted the existence of the State of Israel, and they have large and strong armies. There are fanatical fundamentalist terrorists who are fighting us and will continue to fight us. To our regret, Israel has not yet come to its time of rest. So for many more years we will need a strong army, and you, the youth, are obligated to give three years.

"After all, the generations before you spent many years performing all tasks, whatever had to be done, so we could get to this moment. And at this moment it is your turn to take up the mission. We have to build a force which we hope we'll never use. But we can never for one second close our eyes and dream or be deluded that there is no threat against us," he said, adding that only those prepared for war will be ready physically and spiritually for peace.

"The stronger we are, the more motivated we are, the more the enemy will be deterred."

Settlers not taking safety precautions

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – A top general said last week that settlers in Judea and Samaria are not agreeing to put in place some safety measures, such as fencing off their settlements, and that this could hamper an IDF withdrawal in Hebron.

"The safety packages, including solutions particular to Hebron, have been prepared.

"Some have been implemented, and some have run into ideological opposition from settlers," OC Home Front Maj.-Gen.Shmuel Arad said.

Noam Arnon, spokesperson for the Hebron Jewish residents, said the material protections the army is offering are no substitute for IDF troops. The residents emphatically want them to remain.

"We are not prepared to live in a ghetto and behind walls. They want us to put bullet-proof glass in our windows. But we want to live as the Hatikva says: 'A free people in our own land,'" Arnon said. "We want physical protection, not safety windows and walls around our homes."

A senior defence source told Ma'ariv this week that redeployment in Hebron would not likely take place until after the holiday period which ends on Oct. 5. The final decision will be made by the prime minister after he receives a redeployment plan from Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai.

The defence source said Mordechai would have to meet with Palestine Authority President Yasser Arafat before the decision is made regarding redeployment.

Internal Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani said last Sunday that the redeployment in Hebron would take place "very soon."

Arad, speaking to military reporters, said the Home Front has offered to subsidize the installations of "distress buttons" in the vehicles of residents of Judea, Samaria and the Gaza Strip.

The Motorola-linked system includes a GPS, or global positioning system, that uses satellites to report the exact location of any vehicle. Hundreds have been installed already and residents reportedly received letters with details on how they can obtain one.

No diphteria anti-toxin in Israel

By JUDY SIEGEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Health Ministry has failed to keep even a single usable dose of diphtheria anti-toxin in the country since 1990, even though the disease claimed the life of an 8-year-old Bnei Brak boy in 1988, The Jerusalem Post has learned.

A 4-year-old Jerusalem girl who had not been inoculated as a baby died of the infectious disease two weeks ago.

Last Sunday, a supply of 15 to 20 doses arrived here from France, after a frantic worldwide search had been conducted by the Health Ministry.

The latest case was tentatively diagnosed by family practitioner Dr. Pesach Ostroy in his Mea She'arim clinic on July 31. He told the parents to take their daughter to Hadassah-University Hospital in Ein Kerem and informed the hospital, where she was treated by Dr. Dan Engelhardt, a Hadassah expert in pediatric infectious diseases. He inserted a pacemaker, but her heart failed.

Health Ministry public health department director Dr. Alex Levinthal claimed Hadassah doctors had requested a dose of the serum at midnight on Aug. 2, less than 24 hours before the Mea She'arim girl died of the disease.

However, a Hadassah spokesperson said that even though the diagnosis had not yet been confirmed in lab tests, its doctors had twice asked the ministry for the anti-toxin earlier and were told there was none.

They then called other Israeli hospitals and received the same answer. Engelhardt said he couldn't say whether the girl would have survived if she had received the anti-toxin in time, "but I'm happy it has now arrived in Israel."

The rate of vaccinations against childhood diseases is only 68 per cent in Mea She'arim, compared with nearly 90 per cent in the rest of the country.

High drama, tension punctuate Riot at Christie Pits

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The hour-long Riot at Christie Pits not only depicts the violent anti-Semitism in Toronto in 1933, but also makes an emphatic statement about the racism that still exists in the city. (Global, Aug. 15, 10 p.m.)

"Saying there is no racism in Toronto today is like believing in the tooth fairy," said veteran Toronto Star reporter Jocko Thomas, one of several witnesses interviewed about the events of that hot August night.

To underline this point, high school students invited to the filming of the riot's re-enactment said they believe racism and anti-immigrant feeling are rife in Toronto. A film postscript shows the actual May 5, 1992, riot on Yonge Street.

Ira Levy and Peter Williamson of Breakthrough Films, who fought 13 years to raise the funds to do Riot at Christie Pits, have produced a meticulously researched script based on the book by Cyril Levitt and William Shaffir, but their attempts to recreate the riot with well known actors is somewhat stagey.

Nevertheless, there is high drama and tension when actual witnesses come on camera, especially so when Irv Lasky, 81, catcher for the Harbord Playground softball team, tells the story of the game the night before the riot, which Harbord won against St. Peters. Though a Beaches resident unfurled a swastika flag behind the Harbord batter in the ninth inning, the batter got a winning hit. As Lasky recalls the scene, the excitement and pride in his voice are gut wrenching.

It was the next night's game, which St. Peters won, that saw a huge swastika banner unfurled high on a hill overlooking the game, which sparked the riot. Truckloads of Jewish men from the Spadina Avenue area rushed to the scene when word spread that Jews were being beaten by Nazi sympathizers. Many young Italians also joined in the fray to help their Jewish friends, the film says.

In Riot at Christie Pits, reporter Thomas, then 22, reveals that during the long night, anti-Semites knocked on doors in the non-Jewish neighborhood asking for volunteers "to help beat up Jews."

With relish, photographer Joe Black, 71, a witness to the riot when he was eight, tells how one recruiter entered the family grocery store on Bloor Street and was threatened with a broken arm by his father.

At that very time, and for the critical years following, the film notes, Canada refused to admit Jewish refugees fleeing Hitler.

In the film, the joyous parading of a Torah into the Beaches Hebrew Institute on Kenilworth Avenue to mark the synagogue's 75th anniversary is noteworthy, not in that it signals the end of Toronto racism, but because it marks a bourgeoning pride in Jewish origin.

The haunting strains of klezmer music as background to the riot scenes and the efforts of east end toughs to keep the Beaches free of Jews adds an ironic touch.

It is of interest that in 1933 the Jewish population, about 7.3 percent of the total, was the largest immigrant group in the city, a far cry from today. In 1933, the Jewish population was more than twice as large as the Italian.

Others in the film are boxers Sammy Luftspring and Frank Genovese, Harry and Sol Bergstein, Edward Brickman, Henry Katz, CHIN owner Johnny Lombardi and Toby Ryan.

It's a great documentary, don't miss it!

Yiddish music celebration planned

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The woods around Petit Lac Long in the Laurentians will ring with the freilich sounds of Yiddish music and songs Aug. 22 to 25, when the first KlezKanada, a celebration of Eastern European Jewish culture, is held at Camp B'nai Brith (CBB).

The conference, open to anyone who loves Yiddishkeit, will feature performances by well-known musicians and singers and presentations by experts in Yiddish literature, folklore, drama, humor and film.

Knowlege of Yiddish is not a prerequisite; English will be used in the programming and Yiddish lessons are offered, at beginners or immediate levels.

The headliners are Brave Old World, the four-man klezmer band which recently record the album In the Fiddler's House, with violinist Itzhak Perlman.

Among the 20-odd faculty members are: Canadian singer Beth Ann Cole; Yiddish music authority Zalmen Mlotek; Hankus Netsky, founder of Boston's Klezmer Conservatory Band; folklorist Dov Noy of Hebrew University; Andy Nulman, CEO of Montreal's Just for Laughs festival; documentary filmmaker Josh Waletzky; and Bryna Wasserman, who recently became director of the Yiddish Theatre of the Saidye Bronfman Centre.

Lifetime achievement awards will be presented to Arthur Lerner, Sara Rosenfeld and Dora Wasserman, three Montreal Yiddish stalwarts.

Workshops take the form of both lectures and practical instruction, so musicians such as violinists, clarinetists and guitarists, are invited to bring their instruments.

The programming emphasizes participation, and chair Dr. Hy Goldman says there'll be plenty of sing-alongs and jam sessions throughout.

One event, the KlezKanada Groyser Concert, will be open to the general public Aug. 24 at 8:45 p.m. On the bill are Brave Old World, Cole, Adrienne Cooper, Netsky and others. Tickets must be purchased.

The conference will end with an outdoor Klez Fete in Ste. Agathe des Monts, about six kilometres from the camp, open to the public free of charge.

KlezKanada is organized by the Yiddish committee of the Jewish Education Council and the Foundation for Yiddish Culture in Honor of Jacob Zipper and Shloime Wiseman.

CBB is a children's and senior citizens' summer camp, that offers a wide range of accommodation.

Participants have the choice of staying at the retreat centre, which has simple but comfortable double-occupancy rooms; cabins that can accommodate up to 12 persons (the largest has no washroom inside) and, for the truly adventurous, tents. Children, but not pets, are welcome.

The camp is kosher and meals are included. Shabbat will be observed in the public areas.

Participants may also stay off-site (an option suitable for those with cottages in the area), but they must register for the full program.

For further information, call the Yiddish committee, 514-345-2610.

IAI helps upgrade jets

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Israel Aircraft Industries (IAI) has won part of a major contract to upgrade U.S. Air Force T-38 trainers. The deal is potentially worth $425 million (US).

IAI, teaming up with McDonnell Douglas, beat out five others who submitted bids, including Northrop Grumman, the original manufacturer of the 1950s-vintage supersonic trainer.

The upgrade is expected to extend the life of the T-38, a derivative of the F-5, for at least 15 to 20 years.

The initial contract involves $45.6 million, of which IAI will receive 45 percent, for the production of two prototypes.

IAI will be responsible for the avionics and their integration into the jet. McDonnell Douglas will deal with the airframe and engine and install the avionics "kit" IAI will send to its plant in Texas.

Prototype delivery is expected in 15 to 18 months. Following a year of testing, the U.S. Air Force may decide to upgrade a fleet of over 400 jets, a deal that would be worth about $425 million.

The deal marks the first time IAI has cooperated with a major American firm to upgrade an aircraft.

"This is a step upward to get into this kind of a program. Once you are into this program it means ... you are going to have work and you are going to, I hope, make a profit. It also allows us to market our product in other countries," said Menashe Broder, IAI's vice-president of marketing, who worked on the contract from early last year.

IAI general manager Moshe Keret said winning the contract would greatly enhance IAI's reputation and increase its chances of winning further tenders from other air forces.

The upgrading of the avionics package will be done by the IAI's Lahav division, which has already earned $225 million for upgrading Chile's fleet of F-5s. That was the first time anyone had upgraded the F-5.

IAI is currently competing to win upgrade contracts with two other nations, reportedly Brazil and Thailand.

"This is a very prestigious type of a program, because when the U.S. Air Force runs a program like this, all the major giants are competing. The winner gets not only the business, but also the spin-offs that can come," said Broder.

"This means that all the air forces around the world look and see that we were selected by the U.S. Air Force and must have something good to supply."

Knesset Approves Cuts

JERUSALEM – The Knesset Finance Committee approved NIS 344 million ($151 million Cdn.) in cuts to the 1996 budget by a wide margin last week, though only on condition that, in exchange for other cuts, funds will be restored at a later date to some of the programs affected.

The committee approved the cuts 8-1, with two abstentions, after this formula was agreed on.

According to the compromise formula, each minister will have the right to redistribute the cuts within his own ministry, subject to the committee's approval. Thus Labor and Social Affairs Minister Eli Yishai could restore some of the money which was cut from his welfare budget, in exchange for equal cuts in, for example, professional retraining programs.

Nine Percent Rate Forecast

JERUSALEM – Bank Hapoalim's economists forecast the inflation rate in 1997 to reach nine percent, adding that there is a good chance that it will fall even below this level, the economists said in a monthly report.

The economists said they expect the Treasury to announce an inflation target of between eight and 10 percent for 1997, and to actually achieve it, mainly thanks to the Bank of Israel's tight monetary policy, the government's budget cut and the housing market's burgeoning slow-down.

Lift Barriers Israel Told

JERUSALEM – A Senior U.S. trade official urged Israel to increase imports of American products and lift certain barriers which hurt such imports.

Stuart Eizenstat, undersecretary for international trade at the Commerce Department, said U.S. goods account for only 19 percent of Israel's overall imports, far less than imports from the European Union.

Israel/Egypt Trade

JERUSALEM – Trade between Israel and Egypt could increase by as much as 500 percent over the next three years, Egyptian officials said last week.

This year, bilateral trade is likely to reach $58 million (Cdn.), with that figure rising to $300 million by 1999, the officials said. In 1993, bilateral trade totaled $15 million.

However, they added, this rapid improvement in commercial ties is dependent on continued regional political advances and the implementation of some form of free trade arrangements between the two countries.

Remembering Shalom Aleichem

As if paying respects to a beloved head of state, a vast crowd exceeding 100,000 in number lined the route of the funeral procession for Sholom Aleichem when he died at age 57 in New York City in May 1916, just over 80 years ago.

Among Yiddish writers, Shalom Aleichem ranked among the three most talented interpreters of the Jewish soul, along with Mendele Mocher Sforim and Y.L. Peretz. But thanks largely to the enduring success of the 30-year-old stage musical Fiddler On The Roof, his literary creations are perhaps the best known today, enjoyed by audiences around the world even though he was supposedly the most untranslatable of writers.

Born Shalom Rabinowitz in Pereyaslav, Poltava, in 1859, Shalom Aleichem was the Dickens of the Jewish world, famous for his colorful literary portraits of the little people, the ordinary folk torn between time-honoured tradition and the usually bitter winds of change.

His most famous character is Tevyeh the Dairyman, a simple small-town Jew who misquotes scriptures even in his one-sided conversations with God, and is forced to part with tradition when his seven daughters (five in the play) reject the matchmaker's advice in favor of their own.

As Shalom Aleichem's own daughter has revealed, the model for Tevyeh was a small dark man of the same name and profession who delivered milk, butter, cheese and sour cream to them weekly.

"My father loved to talk to him," Marie Goldberg recalled. "He was immensely amused by the little man's Hebrew quotations....

"Even if Father was writing at the moment, he would leave everything to greet Tevyeh. The latter would carefully put his stuff on the table, wipe his hand on the bottom of his capotteh and shake hands with Father. Their conversations would be long and most satisfying to my father.

"Some years later Tevyeh came to complain to my grandmother one day that people laughed at him because my father wrote about him in the papers. My grandmother reassured him, and he believed her. But we never saw Tevyeh again."

A combination of Job and Don Quixote, Tevyeh seems steeped in both satire and tragedy. "There is nothing funny about Tevyeh the dairyman as a character, and nothing funny ever happens to him," writer Maurice Samuel observed. "What Tevyeh does is to turn the tables on tragedy by a verbal ingenuity; life gets the better of him, but he gets the better of the argument. Then we laugh with him to encourage him – and ourselves."

Another much-beloved character of Shalom Aleichem is Menachem-Mendel, stockbroker and goodhearted shlemiel who never ceases to build castles in the air; his wife is the devoted and scolding Sheineh-Sheindl. Through such simple gentle souls, Shalom Aleichem derived much common wit and wisdom, and somehow captured the fatalistic attitude prevalent in the backward and beleaguered shtetlach of Russia before the close of the last century.

Shalom Aleichem was a champion of the ordinary folk and they loved him for it. His will stipulated that he was to be buried "not among aristocrats, men of high lineage, or men of great wealth, but among common Jewish workingmen, with just ordinary folk." Accordingly, he was buried in the Arbeiter Ring "proletarian" cemetery in Brooklyn.

Ex-lawyer loves to perform

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — People in the arts are often told: "Don't give up your day job." But five months ago singer-comedienne tsufit did just that. She left her job as a litigation lawyer to return to performing.

"This is what I really want to do," tsufit – whose name means hummingbird in Hebrew – said. "Performing is a burning desire that doesn't go away."

The 30-something mother of four young daughters had been performing since she was 14. In University she sang in musicals and in the Law School Follies. She sang and acted in Yiddish with the Toronto Jewish Theatre and accompanied the troupe to Vancouver for Expo 86.

Once she became a lawyer, however, there was little time for performing and she put her music career on hold, she said.

Litigation did offer her plenty of opportunity for theatrics, she added. "That's where all the lawyers who want to be actors end up. You find a lot of talented people among litigation lawyers — singers, actors and musicians."

When a friend asked her to perform at a benefit last winter, her desire to perform professionally was rekindled, tsufit said. "I got a great response. I began thinking I could do this again."

She began preparing to relaunch her singing career, renewing old contacts, putting together a marketing package and making video and demo tapes. In March, she hung up her robes and left the security of her law career to concentrate on performing full time.

By May, she was booked for a number of stage performances and has appeared at Upstairs at Goody's, a downtown comedy club; Comedywood in Thornhill; the Brampton Caravan, a concert series at Yorkhill Park; and private parties and simchahs.

Tsufit writes many of the comic songs she performs, often drawing on her family life and personal experiences. For example, in a song, Broccoli's on Sale at Dominion, she sings about her mother's tendency to call her long distance to give unsolicited advice about what she should be feeding her kids. She also wrote Dr. Tsures, a parody on Dr. Ruth, the New York radio psychologist.

Between songs, tsufit does stand-up comedy — she has a cast of characters heavily influenced by her Jewish background. She accompanies herself on guitar and enjoys performing Israeli and chassidic music, she said.

"I pride myself on my versatility."

Tsufit's biggest fans are her children and her husband, who has been extremely supportive of this career move, she said.

"He understands about a dream and that I have to pursue this dream."

Tsufit left her lawyer job for that of a performer.

Tsufit will be appearing at the Free Times Cafe at 320 College St. on Aug. 14 at 8:30 p.m and at the amphitheatre at Mel Lastman Square on Aug.21 at 7:30 p.m.

The joy of Judaism infuses artist's work

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Riva Nussbaum has never seen the Kotel in Jerusalem, yet its significance pervades her home and her art.

Just inside the family's townhouse is a three-dimensional work, Nussbaum's concept of the Western Wall, with rapt praying figures draped in tallesim pressed against the stones.

The wall sculpture combines realism and symbolism. On a small shelf are miniatures Nussbaum has made: a siddur, a kippah, a tallit, a challah. A toy trumpet signifying the call "to welcome Mashiach" and a pair of candlesticks are placed on top. Above is a U.S. dollar bill with a small photo of the late Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Schneerson, superimposed. The dollar is a memento which Nussbaum's husband Max, received from the Rebbe during a trip to New York with a Lubavitch youth group.

In the living/dining area are other wall sculptures, a smaller replica of the Kotel, a table invitingly set for Shabbat, a Sukkot piece incorporating a sukkah made of wood, with real branches laid over it. There is also a semi-abstract painting of Jerusalem and a family tree.

Nussbaum's first career, cosmetology, took on a rehabilitative focus as she studied and began to work with individuals disfigured by cancer surgery and treatment, burn victims and young people scarred by acne.

But she also painted for pure pleasure and devised wall sculptures utilizing "anything and everything," bits of fabric from drapes and clothing, natural woods, flowers, whatever was at hand.

Sculpture

At the same time, she and her husband were actively searching for a more meaningful way of life and they found it in Lubavitch. As a consequence, the "joy of Judaism" increasingly infuses Nussbaum's art.

In addition to fashioning the wall sculptures, she is now painting murals and borders. Clusters of grapes with trailing vines form a border which enhances the clean-cut decor of her living/dining room. Taking a new career direction, she accepts commissions to create murals and borders.

"I can design whatever is right and comfortable for the client, adding personal touches," she says.

For her 6-year-old son, she has conceived a personalized boy's room. Because he enjoys day camp so much, his bed is a small tent with a foam mattress. On one wall Nussbaum has constructed a simulated campfire with heaped up wood and brightly painted flames. A night light plugged into the midst of the flames gives the illusion of a real fire after dark and tiny stars bring the outdoors in.

Observing that she has "three sons and a princess," Nussbaum leads the way into her 9-year-old daughter's room.

Opposite a truly princess-like bed with a side canopy, she has painted a pink picket fence and arbor festooned with flowers and leaves. Butterflies hover and in a corner is a "tree." There are birds and birdhouses. "Our daughter loves birds," she says.

Drawing on her imagination and resourcefulness, she recently completed a custom mural for all four walls of a child's room — a continuing scene featuring a park, a pond, a gazebo and a path leading to whimsical ducks in kippot and tzitzit. For more information call 905-731-9145.

Riva Nussbaum's art is influenced by Judaism.

Russian dance, music troupe a success

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Third time lucky is indeed the hope of the Russian Dance and Music Company which has had two sold-out concerts in the 550-seat Leah Posluns Theatre and is holding five more performances there at the end of October

Not only that, but the 14-member troupe under the leadership of artistic director Alexei Fateyev is widening its horizons and looking into the possibiliy of concerts in Markham, Brampton and Vaughan.

It's a far cry from the days when most troupe members were stranded in Toronto in 1992. Their show Russians on Broadway had collapsed and a civil war in Yugoslavia had voided their tickets on an airline that was supposed to return them to Moscow.

"We're able to make a living in Canada now, but it has not been easy," said 32-year-old Fateyev, a dancer who leaps around the stage in classic Russian style.

Leah Posluns audiences, most of whom were not Russian, gave a resounding vote of confidence to dancers Fateyev, Alexander Melnikov, Dmitri Frid, Galina Shapovalova, Elena Frid and Evelina Ganina, their numbers choreographed by Evelina Ganina.

Highlights were the climbing rope and trapeze acts of sisters Larissa and Tatiana Zoubrilina, members of the Moscow Circus and of the Canadian company, Cirque de Soleil.

Bank Hapoalim program targets visitors to Israel

TEL AVIV – There's still time for a profitable vacation in Israel.

Rafi Ben-Ami, chief representative for Bank Hapoalim in Canada, said the bank has launched a late summer campaign called Perfect Timing to help visitiors to Israel profit from their holidays. It is offering one-quarter percent higher interest on new accounts, preferred exchange rates on financial investments and gifts.

Israel's largest bank also provides visitors, foreign residents and immigrants a full range of investment opportunities, from tax-free foreign currency deposits to mutual funds and securities. Foreign currency loans for the purpose of acquiring real estate in Israel are also made conveniently available.

This is no fish story — Quebec angler's number one

By ELIAS LEVY
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Robert Acoca, 36, recently took first prize for the 1995 season in the Canadian Sportsfishing National Championships.

The Kirkland resident won the competition sponsored by Canadian Sportsfishing magazine and the TV show of the same name seen on TSN. It was the first time a Quebecer has ever been named angler of the year.

Since the national sportsfishing contest began in 1990, it has always been won by Ontario fishermen.

In order to be a finalist, Acoca, a marketing advisor with Bell Canada, had to spend 80 days in 1995 on the lakes and rivers of Quebec and Ontario.

For the competition, Canada is divided into five regions. In 1992, '93 and '94, Acoca won in Region 4, which includes Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island.

The rules of the national competition are very strict and demanding. Twenty-four species of fish are accepted, including salmon (coho, chinook or Atlantic), char, trout, muskie, pike, yellow pike, small and large mouth bass, perch, carp, anglefish and turbot.

All participants must send the judges two photos showing the catch, one with the fisherman at the place where the fish was taken and the other showing the fish spread out on the ground parallel to a measuring tape. The fisherman must also provide such information as the species, its weight, its size (length and circumference), the place and day of the catch and the lure used, as well as the name of the witness (the angler who was present at the time the fish was caught). Most fish are quickly thrown back into the water.

To win the 1995 national championship, Acoca registered 113 fish belonging to 11 different species. He also took first prize for the biggest fish in the Atlantic salmon category, a fish of about three kilograms, which he caught in Lac Tremblant.

Married and father of two, Acoca first went fishing at the age of three with his father.

"He began to go fishing with me in the Moroccan harbor city of Fedallah, and quickly became an enthusiast of the sport," said Elias Acoca.

Both father and son are very active volunteers in their community. Thirty percent of the final mark given to participants in the national sportsfishing competition is based on community involvement.

For coming first nationally, Acoca won a Ford Explorer worth about $30,000 and an eight-day fishing trip.

Recognition of Munich 11 Israel's 'biggest victory'

By MELANIE A. LASOFF
Atlanta Jewish Times

ATLANTA — "No act of terrorism has ever destroyed the Olympic movement, and none ever will," said Juan Antonio Samaranch, president of the International Olympic Committee (IOC), at the closing ceremony of the centennial Olympics.

To rousing applause, he called for a moment of silence to remember the victims of the Centennial Park bombing on July 27 and the terrorist attack that killed 11 Israelis at the 1972 Munich Olympics. Olympics.

Hearing Samaranch's words was the Israeli Olympic delegation's proudest moment.

"We were excited to tears. It might be our biggest victory in this Olympics,'" Atsmon Paz, the Israeli team's envoy, said in a telephone interview.

"We felt like, 'We've done it.' It's like we got a gold medal somehow."

Like a real gold medal, the accomplishment was a result of 24 years of struggle.

And after a two-week burst of Jewish unity, the efforts for international recognition of the Munich 11 paid off in Atlanta.

The pressure began the day before the opening ceremonies, when children of the slain athletes arrived in Atlanta to meet with international media and dignitaries.

Their goal was to encourage the IOC to incorporate a moment of silence into the Games. Nothing was said at the opening ceremonies, so many of the athletes' family members walked out in disappointment.

But when a bomb exploded in Centennial Olympic Park on July 27, it presented another opportunity, said Arye Mekel, Israel consul general to the southeast.

"It would have been outrageous for [the IOC] not to mention Munich when they mention the Atlanta bombing," he said. The park bombing "brought the message across that not paying attention to [terrorism] is just not the right way."

Although the athletes' families had left Atlanta by last week, the consulate continued to press the case.

Mekel and his staff mobilized Jewish organizational leaders across the country to write and call Samaranch and other Olympic representatives.

In their letters, the Jews urged the officials to pay a long overdue tribute to all victims of terrorism, including the Munich 11.

Several hundred Jews faxed and called the Marriott Marquis hotel downtown, where Samaranch and other IOC members were staying, said Mekel.

Anne McCarthy, the hotel's director of marketing, said she could not confirm the number because the staff does not count faxes or calls.

Among those joining local organizational faxes were national Jewish groups, including the National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council, the Anti-Defamation League and Jewish federations.

Despite the efforts, Mekel said he still was shocked when Samaranch finally reminded the world of the fallen heroes of Munich.

"We didn't know he was actually going to do anything," Mekel said. "Then he came through and said all the right things."

Although it is a victory, the IOC's formal recognition of Munich is only a first step, said Mekel.

The Munich massacre must be remembered at every Olympics, he added. Israeli Olympic officials will meet this month to plan their strategy for the 2000 Games in Sydney, Australia.

About families

Dear Susan,

We have had a wonderful summer. We have been on a very pleasant family holiday, and our teenage boys each attended summer camp for one month. Our children are 17 and 13, and we are worried about how to switch them off of vacation mode in preparation for the fall. How do we get them back into a schedule before school commences?

Dear Reader,

It is important to ease your teenagers into regular routines s-l-o-w-l-y. I recommend that you begin the process of normalizing bedtime, curfews and extracurricular activities approximately two weeks prior to their returning to school.

Your 13-year-old will likely challenge you directly, while at the same time taking some comfort in the boundaries and limits you have set.

Your setting of limits helps your teen to not succumb to his own impulses. This provides him with an emotional safety net, while at the same time fostering self-discipline and control.

On the other hand, you should acknowledge your 17-year-old's greater ability to set his own schedule. The transition to a more "normal" routine should be negotiated, with clear expectations agreed to. Your son may need reining in with regard to some aspects, such as the use of the family car. Overall, you must respect and encourage your son's ability to exercise mature self-determination, yet ensure that appropriate limits do exist.

Protest over Bar Ilan ruling

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Thousands of haredi Jews demonstrated last weekend to protest a decision by Israel's High Court of Justice allowing a main thoroughfare in Jerusalem to remain open to traffic on the Sabbath.

Saturday's protests passed peacefully and there were no major clashes with police, as there had been in previous demonstrations.

In a 6 to 1 decision last week, the high court barred the closure of Bar Ilan Street to Sabbath traffic and called for the formation of a committee to examine the issue.

The presence of Sabbath traffic on Bar Ilan, which cuts through haredi neighborhoods in Jerusalem, has led to a series of often violent demonstrations in recent weeks.

It has become a hot issue on both sides of the religious divide, with haredi Jews seeking laws that will respect the Sabbath and religious holidays, while secular Jews view such laws as an infringement of their freedom.

Immediately prior to the decision, a tense atmosphere prevailed in the court, as activists from both sides awaited the ruling.

Their conflict became evident outside the courtroom, where the two sides became embroiled in shouting matches.

The judges, who called for the formation of a committee to examine the matter of Sabbath traffic on streets throughout Jerusalem, ruled that an injunction against closing Bar Ilan would remain in place until the committee issued its recommendations in two months.

"The purpose of such a committee will be to find a way to nurture coexistence between all segments of Israel's population," the justices wrote in the majority opinion led by court President Aharon Barak. Only Justice Zvi Tal dissented.

The ruling came after the expanded panel heard petitions from religious and secular groups.

"What is at stake here is not just one street, but the entire future of how Israel will look in the 21st century. Will it be a democratic

PM, Levy make peace

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Foreign Minister David Levy have apparently managed to patch up their differences.

The two held a two-hour meeting Sunday, in an effort to mend a rift in their relationship that was made public when aides complained that Levy was being left out of foreign policy decisions.

The Prime Minister's Office described the meeting as good, saying that the two had agreed on ways to cooperate.

During their talks they agreed to form a ministerial committee headed by the premier and including the foreign and defence ministers, to formulate foreign and defence policy.

Levy and Netanyahu also agreed that the Foreign Ministry would have a special status in matters regarding the peace process.

In addition, they decided to appoint former Israel Defence Force chief of staff Dan Sharon to head the Israeli side of the steering

El Al office moves to Toronto

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — El Al is moving its Canadian head office from Montreal to Toronto, following the lead of other international airlines – such as KLM, Alitalia, and Lufthansa – which have relocated in recent years to compete more aggressively with the expanding and more lucrative market west of Quebec.

El Al's incoming general manager for Canada, Moshe Shamai, described the move as purely "technical."

"The El Al office in Montreal will in no way decrease its level of service," said Shamai, 45, who previously oversaw El Al's scheduling system at Ben-Gurion Airport.

He said he would be based in Montreal during a year-long transition period.

Yonah Nechushtan, whom Shamai is succeeding, said the move was a "management" decision and indicated it would put El Al in a better position to cater to Ontario's expanding Jewish and non-Jewish market, and to recoup passenger traffic lost to Air Canada since the airline began

NEW CAMPAIGN OVER JERUSALEM STATUS

It is widely expected that Jordan will introduce a resolution to condemn Israel's claim to the city when the UN General Assembly convenes next month.

Recently the Vatican has criticized Israel for its "Judaization" of Jerusalem and the "suffocation" of its Christian and Moslem population. There has also been an attempt to have the general board of the National Council of Churches adopt a resolution against "annexation."

UJA closes B&P network for women

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Fourteen years after its inception, the Business and Professional Women's Network (B&P) of United Jewish Appeal has ceased to exist, and its membership is being absorbed by Women's Campaign.

But longtime members view B&P's demise as progress. When the network was established, it was designed to meet the needs of career women for the first time in the context of UJA.

Programs were held in the evening, or occasionally on the weekend. The network, true to its name, was a forum for making both business and social contact.

"There was a real sense of chevra," said Rochelle Wolfond, B&P chair for the 1996 UJA campaign. Educational and advocacy programming on women's issues, as well as fundraising for Israel and the local Jewish community, were the cornerstones of B&P.

The division brought 725 new contributors into UJA; their donations last year totalled $300,000.

Wolfond, who was in commercial real estate when she joined B&P 12 years ago, stopped working outside the home a number of years ago. She is not untypical.

At the same time, over the past several years, an increasing number of members of Women's Campaign — originally geared to the needs of women not working outside the home — have returned to the paid work force. In fact, in recent years Women's Campaign has had a higher proportion of volunteers who work outside the home than B&P.

"The lines have blurred," said Wolfond.

The phenomenon is not unique to Toronto, notes Glennie Lindenberg, a lawyer and founding member of B&P who is currently co-chair of the UJA management team, professional cabinet. At a meeting of the General Assembly of Jewish Federations, she learned that B&P counterparts in other North American cities were also becoming unnecessary.

Lindenberg's current UJA position may reflect a general change in attitude. According to Wolfond, UJA had "practically no women involved in leadership positions" 15 years ago, but is now "quite gender-blind."

Because of the dearth of women in leadership positions at that time, B&P offered leadership development, for which there was only scarce opportunity elsewhere in Campaign. Today UJA Campaign includes a young professionals network, a young business network, a young construction network and an overall young leadership network, all of which have a high proportion of women involved.

Ex B&Pers who have moved on to a professional division will continue to be informed about women's issues and programming through Women's Campaign.

"I see this as a positive thing. It has to do with the changing of society," said Wolfond. "I guess I'll be somewhat nostalgic for B&P days, but ... my heart is with UJA. The most important thing for me is to help raise money."

BB wants share of VLT revenues

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The provincial government should share revenue from controversial video lottery terminals with charities, says B'nai Brith Canada (BBC).

The introduction by Queen's Park of 20,000 terminals across the province "should be viewed as a partnership with the charitable sector," BBC recently told public hearings on Bill 75, which would make video lotteries legal in Ontario.

But B'nai Brith is worried because competition from the terminals will detract from traditional gaming, such as bingo, raffles and sweepstakes, and "diminish the ability of charities to fundraise from this gaming," BBC treasurer David Colodny and executive vice-president Frank Dimant told MPPs.

Newspaper examines religious beliefs

Ha'aretz is one of Israel's leading independent daily newspapers. It is a "grey" morning paper without the stylistic or substantive flash and sensation of Israel's two largest dailies, Yediot Achronot and Ma'ariv. In appearance it resembles somewhat the Globe and Mail or the New York Times. Even though it provides heavy coverage of financial and economic matters, its editorial policy is generally considered to be left of centre. And it is, of course, secular.

I recently received the Friday supplement to the July 26 issue of Ha'aretz. The cover is pitch black speckled with silver dots to create the impression that it is a view of a midnight sky aglow with the flickering illuminations of countless stars. Across this firefly firmament, in bold blue lettering, is the question: "Does God Exist?"

Underneath the rather large question, modestly at the bottom of the page one reads: "(The answer on pages 18 - 71)".

The editor "dedicates the supplement to the existence of God." In all, there are 11 articles. But the subject is treated as a curio, a journalistic romp into a new-age playground, neither serious nor respectful of religious sensibilities. It is, to say the least, a disappointment. I prefer to believe however that this failed exercise was more the result of ignorance than of mischief or malevolence, and as such, a magazine mirror reflecting the extent and sophistication of the religious beliefs of the modern, secular Israeli who holds its pages.

But the supplement wasn't a complete disappointment. The first article of the 11 describes a poll conducted of all of the members of the Knesset. Each member was asked the question: "Do you believe in God?" All of the answers are recorded and the results are interesting.

Ninety-one members stated that they do believe in God. Twenty refused to answer. Nine said that they did not believe. The author of the article, Gidon Alon, who posed the questions and collated the results categorized the parliamentarians answers into five distinct types. I shall reproduce his findings.

The first type of answer came from members who were themselves religious or traditional, representatives of religious parties or members who wear a kippah but who represent secular parties, such as Chaim Dayan of Tsomet. They have a strong belief in God. Some of them were even set aback by the question. "How can one not believe?" answered Yigal Bibby of the National Religious Party.

The second category of answer came from members who belong to secular parties but who are traditional in their observance as a result of a religious education, such as Dahlia Itzik from Labor, or as a result of a religious upbringing in their homes, such as Rafi Elul , also of Labor.

The third category of answer was from secular members who attempted to avoid giving an answer by stating that the question was too deeply personal to answer or by simply refusing to answer without explanation. Alon said that it was difficult to know if the avoidance stemmed from a reluctance to disclose their lack of belief or simply, from their refusal to take part in the poll.

The fourth answer was the categorical denial of the belief in God. These members were quite open about their atheism. Yael Dayan fell into this category.

The fifth answer was the equivocation, akin to agnosticism. These members were clearly uncomfortable to disclose that they actually believed in God; thus they attempted to qualify their belief in other terminology. Some examples of these answers were: "I believe in a higher being", or "in a superior force", or "I believe that nothing happens by itself." Roman Bronfman of Yisrael b'Aliyah typified this response.

Eighteen of the 21 Likud members were willing to identify themselves as believers. Twenty one of the 33 Labor members said that they were believers. Not surprisingly, none of the nine members of Meretz said that they believed in God. Six avoided answering; three said openly that they did not believe.

The prime minister believes in God. Shimon Peres believes in God. Refael Eitan refused to answer, as did Benjamin Begin and Ariel Sharon.

The believers constitute the vast majority. Of the 120 members, only nine said they did not believe in the existence of God. Ninety one members, more than three-quarters of the total, believe in God. If the sampling is representative of the population as a whole, even including the Arab members who are also among the believers, there is reason for optimism that the religious/secular divide can be bridged some day.

The vast majority of the people holds fast and deeply to the same fundamental belief: the ethical monotheism of the God of Israel. Common history, shared destiny and a core love of peoplehood bind the majority to each other. What is shared by the majority is far greater and far more powerful than what is divergent within it.

It is for those people who would step away from extremism, from the path of the unforbearing, who instead would lead the majority onto a path of tolerance and respect for each other, to now step forward.

BB addresses VLT issue

B'nai Brith and other Jewish organizations often use bingo, games of chance and sponsor casino evenings to raise money.

More than $2.5 billion is wagered annually at gaming organized by religious and social service groups, BBC said. "Charities have become dependent on the funds raised through charity gaming."

But over the past few years, "there has been a steady and progressive erosion of the rights and abilities of charities to raise funds [from gaming] in the face of competition by government-provided gaming."

The proposed terminals have met with controversy. Some religious groups oppose them, saying they're just another form of gambling and will hurt the poor.

BBC's recommendations were:

- Video lottery terminals should be introduced into charity casinos and bingo halls owned and operated by charities for charities.
- "A portion" of funds derived from the terminals should be distributed to gaming charities "to enable them to continue their charitable work."
- Income from terminals in charity casinos and bingo halls should be shared on a 50-50 basis.

If Bill 75 is approved, Ontario will become the ninth province to allow video lottery terminals. Plans call for the machines to be installed at racetracks and charity casinos this fall. A second phase would move them into restaurants and bars.

Rodos makes Zairenu her second home

Communities cannot function and prosper without the commitment, care and tireless efforts, mostly unrecognized, of countless hard-working individuals. They are the "unsung heroes" of the community. Spotlight will appear occasionally.

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Asked to describe her job as a teacher at Zairenu, a school for children with special needs, Elena Rodos says she is the hands and voices of the students.

As a special education teacher, Rodos, 41, works with 6- to 9-year- olds who are non-verbal and physically challenged. They are enrolled in Zairenu's Total Communication Program (TCP), to help them learn to communicate without words.

The TCP class was recently expanded from a half-day to a full-day program and has a staff that includes Rodos as well as an early childhood educator and communications, physio, occupational and music therapists.

"It is a challenging job but I'm repaid in the satisfaction I get when I see the small things the students can achieve with the help of our team.

Rodos, who was educated in a pedagogical institute in Russia, started at Zairenu as a volunteer and worked to become a full-time teacher. "There is nothing to say except that it is a beautiful place to work. It is a warm environment and I really feel like it is a second home. There really is no other place like Zareinu."

The program's goal, is to teach the students, in a Jewish environment, the everyday skills that come naturally to most children. This would not be achieved, she says, were it not for the skills, patience "and soft hearts of all the teachers. We all love the kids. The special relationship extends to the parents as well. We become like family.

"In order to integrate the children's home and school life, we have parents record any of their evening or weekend activities such as a picture of someone they visited, a book they read together or a napkin from a restaurant. The children then share their experiences with the rest of the class."

A lot of her work is done at home, she says, because it is such a consuming job, there is no time for preparation at school. "Each child has different needs and I am always preparing something for them. One needs to learn to recognize his name so I created a large-piece puzzle out of the letters in his name.

While attending university courses in Toronto, Rodos was told that there was no other place like Zareinu "and that is really the truth. Between the highly qualified and dedicated teachers and the personal attention that is paid to the children, the only problem we have is worrying where the children will go when they graduate."

Senior scares off 'gangsters'

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Helen Kaminski didn't suddenly develop superhuman strength and lift a car that was pinning her child. Neither did she dive into a rushing river to save a drowning man.

But the senior citizen and Holocaust survivor did surprise herself, her friend and two "gangsters" who were planning to snatch her purse, with an unlikely display of bravado and street theatre.

Kaminski foiled the robbery attempt despite her age (she'd rather not say how old she is), her heart condition, and the fact that the two potential lawbreakers were youths on bikes.

It all started a few weeks ago when just before nightfall she was sitting with a friend on a bench in a small parkette at Bathurst and Ellerslie, near the Bathurst Jewish Centre. A young man on a bicycle approached and asked for cigarettes.

After she replied that she had none and would he please leave them alone, she could see another young man approaching from the rear as the first man continued to ask for a smoke. Sensing the ne'er-do-wells were up to no good, she rose to her feet and raised her voice.

Helen Kaminski

"I started to shout very very loud because I was sure they wanted to do something to us," she said.

When she heard one say "the bag, the bag" to his accomplice, she "showed the stick [near] his head and shouted so that the police would come."

The two scruffy-looking young men took their bicycles and, as the police might say, vacated the scene.

Though she's frail, in poor health and doesn't hear so well, Kaminski doesn't think she did anything extraordinary. While people half her age would have let the purse go, Kaminski said she reacted instinctively.

"I couldn't believe it. I was nervous. It was not me. I don't know how I could talk to them so loud," she said.

A native of Poland who survived the Holocaust by hiding with her two small children, Kaminski downplays her recent encounter with the would-be thieves.

"It's not such a big thing, how I made so much energy with the stick. I was ready to give him one. I saw he was a gangster," she said.

Hershkovitz heads to China as Canada's cultural attache

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Linda Hershkovitz paused mid-interview to provide a phone reference for her children's nanny — one of umpteen details that required her attention before her recent departure to Beijing. For the next two years, she will serve in China's capital city as cultural attache at the Canadian Embassy.

Aside from a few pieces of Chinese art, there was little in the 45-year-old academic's unpretentious Toronto home to suggest an upcoming transition to diplomatic life — excluding her home office, of course, where the fax machine had been humming with daily transcontinental communiques to and from the four-person staff awaiting her arrival.

Despite the familiar Canadian domesticity of her home — notes on the fridge, 2-year-old Mira's stroller and 3-year-old Matt's small bicycle near the front door — Hershkovitz is no stranger to China.

A native of Toronto with a PhD in Chinese History, she lived there as a graduate student from 1978 to 1980 and has returned at least once a year since, most recently as a consultant on gender equity strategy, among other things.

Her fascination with the country began with an interest in its politics, socialism specifically. She was raised on kitchen table political discussions: her late parents, Al and Fay Hershkovitz, who in 1979 visited her in China as part of a trade union delegation, were both political activists.

Of her two-year stint in China, she spent six months in Beijing studying Mandarin, which she speaks and reads "fairly fluently. I can get along fine, [but learning the language] is an enormous task that never ends."

Linda Hershkovitz

Her husband, Marvin Zuchowski, a psychologist with the Toronto Board of Education, has been taking Chinese lessons in preparation for his two-year leave of absence. Even Matt is readying himself, asking the Chinese words for "playground" and "sandbox."

Although it's next to impossible for foreigners to integrate completely, Hershkovitz became friendly with some of her Chinese counterparts when she was there as a student.

Her local friends knew little about Judaism, but "on the whole they were very positive ... I get the feeling the Chinese feel an affinity with Jewish culture. They'll say things like, 'We [both] have a long unbroken civilization, a long tradition of scholarship.' "

As Canada's 14th Counsellor, Cultural and Educational Affairs since diplomatic relations were established in 1970, Hershkovitz will work at promoting cultural relations and contacts between the two countries. Smoothing the way for visiting performers and providing them with opportunities to meet their Chinese counterparts is one aspect of the job.

"We'll be exposing China to the best of Canadian culture. We're promoting Canada's image as a good, progressive country with a vibrant cultural life ... a country with values, history and a political system worth studying and learning from."

There's also a business angle, she noted. One example is a growing market for Canadian television programs, as more and more Chinese people get television sets.

On the educational side, Hershkovitz will select Chinese graduate students and more senior scholars to study in Canada on exchange programs.

Over 20 Chinese universities and research institutes have Canadian studies programs, and the works of Canadians such as Northrop Frye and Farley Mowat are currently being translated into Chinese with the assistance of Canada's department of foreign affairs and international trade.

Academics like Hershkovitz have benefited from programs the Canadian government has developed with China over the years, she noted. "It may sound a little hokey, but I'm glad I have the opportunity to repay some of that investment."

Although her official duties will occupy most of her time, she plans to keep a watchful academic's eye on local sociological issues.

She also plans to make time for the Jewish community. With the large number of diplomats and Israeli businesspeople in Beijing, a community seder held at a hotel attracted hundreds of people, she heard.

In Beijing, Hershkovitz will straddle two worlds, living in the embassy compound and working on a daily basis with the Chinese. "I think it's possible to arrive at some balance, and I hope to do that."

Audey Stanleigh loses battle with leukemia

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Audey Stanleigh, who for hundreds of people embodied courage and grace in the face of extreme adversity, succumbed to a 2½-year battle with leukemia on Aug. 9. He was 21 years old.

Despite his youth, all who recall Audey described him as mature beyond his years, someone who handled his plight with a dignity and selflessness that touched the hearts of all, including doctors and nurses hardened by years of exposure to cancer and its ravages.

Even when he was sick, Audey lent his efforts to fundraising and blood drives to find bone marrow transplants for others, his family said last week. In one year, his father Jerome noted, Audey helped raise over $100,000 through various drives.

Audey's plight became a well known cause in the Jewish community, especially in the Spring Farm section of Thornhill, where the Stanleighs live. In March 1994, while spending a year studying at a yeshivah in Israel, he was diagnosed with acute lymphoblastic leukemia, a particularly virulent strain of the disease. After unsuccesful chemotherapy treatments in Israel, he returned to Toronto to await a bone marrow transplant.

Miraculously, a match was found through a local drive for Jay Feinberg, the 28-year-old New Jersey leukemia victim whose own campaign for a compatible donor ended with an adequate match. Feinberg is now at home, doing well.

For Audey, the worldwide search for a donor ended not far away: Stephen Cheifetz of Windsor donated marrow. After a difficult recovery, it looked as though Audey had pulled through. But in March of last year, he relapsed and doctors offered little hope.

He spent the following seven months at Toronto's Princess Margaret Hospital. A few months following his release, he had another relapse and underwent a second transplant from Cheifetz just last month. The procedure worked, and Audey quickly regenerated leukemia-free marrow. But his body, so wracked by infections, could not recover. He'd had a stroke, and on erev Shabbat, Aug. 9, Audey quietly died in hospital.

"He was a genuine soul," his father Jerome recalled last week. "He represented the essence of what all us love to believe in and want for our children, like love of life and dedication. Right until the very end, he never had a bitter word. He never complained. The harder the fight got, the harder he fought, but never loudly. He had a quiet courage."

Audey found solace in his Orthodox faith: "There wasn't a time when he didn't learn and pray," said his father. "Until his last Shabbat, he sang."

"If we have anything to give the world as Jews, it's the kind of total committment Audey had. He was a teacher, a brother and a son."

Audey Stanleigh

Audey was born in Vancouver and graduated from Toronto's Associated Hebrew School and Yeshivat Or Chaim. A brilliant math student, he was accepted in the University of Toronto's engineering school. He was also an accomplished artist.

During a 1994 taping of the Shirley Show, on which Audey was introduced to Cheifetz, Audey's sister Shira, then 10, ran up to Cheifetz and sobbing, gave him a big hug, saying he had "saved my best friend."

Family and friends recalled how Audey inspired everyone around him, even fellow patients, with his wit and charm.

"Others felt better around him," said his mother Ilana. "He never felt sorry for himself and never lost his belief. I learned the meaning of life through him."

Recalled his brother Yoni, 22: "He felt his struggle reflected that of the Jews, that the odds have been stacked against us, but that Jews will always fight on."

For the family, one sign of how much Audey affected even the professionals around him was that his nurses and doctors attended the funeral or came to the shivah house.

Audey leaves his parents, brother Yoni, sisters Dikla and Shira, grandmother Dina in Israel and thousands of friends and admirers around the world.

Reaping the whirlwind

This is the time of year when a mild melancholy begins to set in. Individuals sense the approaching end of summer and see in the tinges of orange and brown on some of the leaves the changing of yet another season.

In contrast to the cooling of nature's temperatures, and adding to the feeling of mild melancholy this year, is the heating up of Quebec politics. This time the issue is language. As the Globe and Mail recently observed, "The language war is marked by a new mood of militancy among anglophones, adding a new unpredictable element to the national unity issue."

The current language flare-up was caused by the decision of the government of Quebec in early June to more strictly enforce its controversial language law by reviving the Commission de protection de la langue française.

Pushed by government into an existential corner, the nervous, angry English minority in Quebec has become more assertive in defence of its rights, indeed encouraged to be so by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien himself. Even as the Quebec government announced the hiring of additional inspectors – alternatively known pejoratively as language police or tongue troopers – to investigate complaints about English-only store signs, a number of people from the anglophone community began a grassroots campaign to press for the inclusion of English on French-only signs.

At the centre of the campaign is Howard Galganov, a Montreal businessman who recently spearheaded a successful boycott of Montreal businesses which had posted signs only in French.

But, as we predicted when the Lucien Bouchard government announced its new enforcement measures, the cycle of measure and counter-measure has spiralled upward, accompanied on both sides by careless accusations and inflammatory rhetoric. Galganov's success has evoked fiery responses from separatist leaders. The situation is becoming ripe for extremists to exploit fraying nerves and vulnerable sensibilities. For example, The Jewish General Hospital was the site of a highly publicized protest last week over a questionable, clearly isolated incident of only English being used.

As we have written on numerous occasions, we understand and share Quebecers' concerns for protecting the French language in North America against all incursions. "Preserving and enhancing the French language, its culture, its ways, its traditions and its beauty, is one of our society's chief objectives. Though this is, obviously, of primary importance for Quebecers, it is equally so for all Canadians."

In our view, a thriving, vital, economically sound Quebec within a thriving, vital, economically sound Canada is the very best way to protect the French language. The will, weight, wherewithal and prestige of the federal institutions of Canada, a country admired around the world and acknowledged as among the very best in which to live and raise one's family, are a far more effective weapon in defence of the French language than the bunkered-down battalions of an extremely self-focussed, almost xenophobic government.

Having sown the wind of anger, suspicion and alienation, the government of Quebec may now be reaping its awful whirlwind, and in the process, bring further anxiety upon a province, a country and its good people.

Poland to place buffer around Auschwitz

As the only Canadian delegate to the recent meeting of the International Council to the State Museum of Auschwitz-Birkenau, I welcome and support the announcement that the government of the Republic of Poland will prepare an extensive program to arrange protective zones around the State Museum of Auschwitz-Birkenau. I strongly endorse the decision by the government that all construction in the vicinity of the museum be halted until the plans for this area are developed in line with the council's recommendations.

The council's recommendations are that the silence zone directly adjacent to the museum be extended and that services which are presently located in the museum, such as restaurant, snack bar, money exchange office, flower shop, book and souvenir shops and the bus/car parking lot be relocated to a further distance from the museum.

A key recommendation is that the protective zones be under the direct control of the Central Government and not the town and local regional governments.

The council welcomed and supported the government announcement that it is prepared to help develop the infrastructure of the town of Oswiecim to better serve the residents and the 500,000 yearly visitors to the area.

It was felt that the crosses and stars of David located in Birkenau on the "fields of pyres" where thousands of human bodies were burned should be removed and replaced with appropriate monuments or commemorative tablets to honor the memories of victims and to indicate their diverse nationalities and religions. (The greatest number of victims were Jewish men, women, children and infants.)

The council has accepted my proposal that the museum establish a press section to inform the public in Poland and abroad of its plans and to counteract misinformation originating from hostile and questionable sources.

More Aliya Bet heroes

Your July 11 article about Canadian volunteers in the Hagana's post-World War II Aliya Bet fleet brought back cherished memories of my own experiences as a sailor on one of those broken-down refugee ships.

I would like to add the following names to the list of heroes: Sol Goldberg, Montreal, The Jewish State; Laz Kahansky, Montreal, The Jewish State; Bernard Kogan, Montreal, Wedgewood; Joe Liberson, Winnipeg, Calanit; Abe "Archie" Taller, Ottawa, Calanit; Julius Witeroff, Montreal, Calanit; Moshe Sokoloff, Toronto, Haganah.

No commitment by volunteers to BBYO

As regional director of Montreal BBYO, it is my hope that our community will review your Aug. 1 article concerning BBYO with caution. While I am sure your purpose in writing this article was for community interest, the end result is less than positive.

The information you quoted on alumni assuming leadership in fundraising was inaccurate. To be specific, alumni have expressed interest in learning of Montreal BBYO's trials. Consequently they have agreed to spearhead discussions on renegotiating a new vision for BBYO and to establish any possible FEDERATION CJA involvement based on changes that were essential to make. Your article indicates a commitment that our volunteers never agreed to take on.

Merchant of Venice is a painful experience

Re: Eye on Arts by Bill Gladstone (CJN Aug. 8). The writer asks the question, "Is The Merchant of Venice a play best left on the shelf?"

The answer is a resounding yes! Why do we have to torture ourselves into justifying this Shakespearean work that needs so much explaining and rationalizing. It is a painful experience for most Jews. Neither the fine acting of Douglas Rain nor the new setting of the pre-holocaust years in Italy lessen the rage that I and those who were with me felt every time the word Jew was spat out.

We left feeling that the tragic Nazi horror of this century was made easier by 1,000 years of having the Jew depicted as a usurer and a non-Christian. It is time for the artistic world to stop trying to explain the unexplainable.

To Marti Maraden and future well intentioned artists — the quality of mercy will forever be strained with the production of The Merchant of Venice. Let it rest in peace.

The big chill puts discussion on hold

By ELI RUBENSTEIN

Did you hear the one about...? Chances are you will be hearing that phrase less and less in the future. Why? The arena of public discourse is constantly being narrowed by a culture that feeds off a feeling of victimization and an overacute sense of being wronged.

Almost any item may manage to offend, even when it is clear that those who authored the "offensive" item bear no malicious intent, and even when it can be argued objectively that the item is not necessarily offensive. In short, the big chill has set in.

Look at the picture in the centre of this article. It was taken during the 1992 March of the Living from Auschwitz to Birkenau. I chose the photo for the cover of an award winning anthology of the prose, poetry, photos and art created by past participants in the March. To my mind, the photo was moving and captured the image of a Jewish teen, draped in a flag bearing the symbol of the Jewish people, marching down the tracks that once carried so many of her ancestors on a terrifying journey into the heart of darkness. And I'd wager that most people who viewed the cover saw something similar.

Once the book hit the stands, however, the most bizarre complaints made their way to me. One individual grumbled that the photo was too nationalistic; and nationalism, Jewish or otherwise, had no place in Auschwitz. Another caller criticised the cover of the book because its underlying message to teens told them it was permissible to walk down railroad tracks, an extremely unsafe practice.

In my own synagogue, I found myself in trouble after making the point that Judaism is a religion that has historically stressed intellectual pursuit and academic excellence over other pursuits. To this end, I recalled the classic joke: What's the thinnest book in the world? Famous Jewish sports heroes.

The complaint, in letter form, stated that the joke was racist, as it suggested that Jews were better than non-Jews, in that all Jews were cerebral while all non-Jews were jocks. Never mind that a devotion to intellectual pursuits does not necessarily make the Jewish people better than other cultures. Never mind that virtually every history of Judaism states that one of Judasim's unique features is its emphasis on study (hence, the "people of the book"). By suggesting that Judaism – for better or for worse – is a culture that places study among its highest values, one is hereby declared a racist. Case closed.

My most jarring experience with the big chill occurred in an encounter with Jewish feminists after a short speech I delivered at a U.S. conference. During my presentation I related what I thought, and still think, is an innocent joke concerning Jewish guilt.

As part of my speech, in reference to a discussion of what is the Torah's most oft-repeated commandment, I humorously suggested it was the one that stated: "Thou shalt feel guilty." And I told the following joke: How do Jewish mothers differ from most? Most mothers tell their offspring: If you don't finish your lunch, I'll kill you. A Jewish mother informs her emaciated charges: "I'll kill myself!"

After the conference, I was taken to task by a prominent American Jewish feminist, and later by other feminist activists whose opinion I solicited on the issue. Their view was that the Jewish mother joke was a contemptuous insult that was unquestionably offensive to Jewish women. My argument, that the joke was a loving and humorous reference to Jewish motherhood, fell upon deaf ears.

When I protested that a number of women actually thanked me for injecting an element of humor into an otherwise serious evening, I was informed that deep down these women were offended, even if they didn't realize it. My rejoinder that deep down my feminist critic actually liked the aforementioned joke was met without the slightest appreciation. Further, I was even accused of being responsible for the high rate of intermarriage — as the Jewish mother jokes I was telling were the reason why Jewish men did not want to marry Jewish women.

While my opponents sought to invest with intense political significance every joke told in which Jewish women appeared, I argued, unsuccessfully, that "sometimes a cigar is just a a cigar" (Freud), "a rose is a rose is a rose" (Gertrude Stein)...and a joke is just a joke. Equally unpersuasive was my contention that they underestimated the resilience of Jewish women, most of whom would listen to the jokes, have a laugh and move on with their lives.

On a gut level, on a "what I really believe" plateau, I was convinced that they were mistaken in their criticism. Yet life is about learning, and so I offered to reconsider my position. However, when I asked one of the individuals to entertain the possibility that she might be mistaken — I was greeted with a flat out, "No, there is no possibility I am wrong." It is a frightening phenomenon to be confronted by anyone who is acquainted with the truth in such immutable terms.

Intrigued by their criticisms and genuinely wondering if I was really that obtuse about the offensiveness of my remarks, I shared the above dialogue with my female co-workers in Canada and Israel. Most insisted that the feminist critique did more harm than good in the effort to combat sexism.

In the feminist case, the damage being done is the very development they would most hope to avoid. There are numerous bona fide feminist issues in both the secular and the Jewish world that cry out for attention. Yet when the dialogue focuses on a joke about Jewish guilt, a "girl cries wolf" scenario is created. Almost invariably, it strains the credibility of these same social critics when they do begin to address critical women's issues.

The big chill in public discourse, as seen in the examples above, reflects a mixture of a number of phenomena: of political correctness; of the culture of complaining, "if I feel this way then it must be true;" of looking through the world only through the narrow prism of one's own particular sensitivity, cause or political movement.

Who loses in the big chill in public discourse? In the first place, democracy. Individuals will become increasingly reluctant to say anything slightly controversial for fear that it might offend someone – somehow, somewhere. Thus, we are engendering a new age of totalitarianism in the free expression of ideas.

The second loser is rational, logical thought: There is no need for objective standards, no argument that there are other interpretations to a given statement – I am offended, ergo you and your remarks are offensive.

The third negative result of this phenomenon is that we lose opportunities to learn...Take two classic light bulb jokes: How many Orthodox Jews does it take to change a light bulb? Answer: None – they never change anything! How many Reform Jews does it take to change a light bulb? Answer: Thousands – they don't want to change just one light bulb, they want to change every corner of the house. Orthodox and Reform Jews may hear these jokes and become offended. Or they may laugh at the underlying truths that Orthodoxy changes slowly (perhaps too slowly) and Reform Judaism changes rapidly (perhaps too rapidly) — and still maintain trust in their respective systems, or conversely, re-evaluate their beliefs.

The point is, the defensive response in the case of both the Reform and the Orthodox jokes inhibits an individual from reflecting on his or her culture and perhaps trying to effect change within its confines. The prospect of having to deal with the abovementioned defensive response acts as a powerful disincentive for those who would have otherwise used this material in a public setting. The result? The big chill sets in and everyone loses.

The last negative result — perhaps the saddest aspect of this whole debate — is that we are creating a society that immediately imputes the worst motives to those we disagree with. There are probably not many worse feelings than being suspected of something you are not. Yet we strike like lightning, with an almost religious zeal, to brand individuals with names like "racist," "chauvinist," and "elitist."

In a way, we are witnessing an inversion of Anne Frank's famous statement, "I still believe, in spite of everything, people are really good at heart," and of the Mishnaic ideal of the rabbis who ask us to "judge all people by giving them the benefit of the doubt." The new fundamentalism argues that despite everything, let's give the worst possible interpretation, let's attribute the least noble motives, to a statement subject to multiple interpretations. In short, let's build a society where suspicion and mistrust are promoted as ethical ideals.

A wise man from Galicia once said: When someone tells me that he is 60 percent sure about something, I am happy. When I am told by an individual that he is 70 percent certain about a given subject, I'm even happier...80 percent and I begin to worry...90 percent, I'm even more concerned. But when someone tells me that he is 100 percent certain about a given belief, I consider the man to be a scoundrel, a rogue, an agent of the devil. Because it is precisely these people who are so arrogant about their beliefs that they will commit any act, no matter what the cost, no matter who is harmed, in the name of their ideologies.

After all is said and done, here is my plea. Next time you read, hear or come across something that doesn't sit well with you, that "presses your buttons," ask yourself the following questions: Is my interpretation the only one applicable to this given statement? Is my view necessarily an accurate reflection of what this person meant to impart? Is my view representative of what most people would feel? And finally, am I ready to enter into a dialogue with the author of the statement or is my position so infallible that all I seek to do is to muzzle another with my vehemence?

As the wise man from Galicia admonishes, never be certain about ideology — less so about a subjective interpretation to a given event. Certainty is arrogance. Rather, show a measure of humility about the religious or philosophical positions you stake out. In the process, your position may become more persuasive, or you may step closer to the position you previously criticised. Either way, we will have moved in the direction of a more truthful and tolerant society, one that values the genuine learning that blossoms from real dialogue. Moreover, we will have begun to effect a thaw in the big chill that is in danger of freezing our public spaces into a permanent state of mistrust, resentment, condemnation and the rush to accuse.

Opinions

King Hussein's Jerusalem dilemma

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's meeting with Jordanian King Hussein earlier this month represented a shift of nuance in the Israeli government's emphasis in dealing with the Jordanian-Palestinian issue.

By Shira Herzog

Historically, there have been two different Israeli approaches to Jordan's role in a peace process. The first, to which Yitzhak Rabin subscribed — and which Netanyahu appears to accept — views Jordan as having a central role in the final agreement. According to this approach, Jordan should be strengthened at the expense of the Palestinians.

The second, to which Shimon Peres and the architects of the Oslo process subscribe, views the Palestinians as the significant players in the area. This perception is fuelled by uncertainty as to the future of Jordan in the post-Hussein era, and as to the nature of relations between the Jordanians and the Palestinians once a final agreement on the territories is reached.

This debate, which has its roots in the '70s, had practical ramifications in the drafting of the "Jerusalem clause" in the Israeli-Jordanian peace treaty signed in October 1994. King Hussein agreed to sign the treaty only after the inclusion of the clause, which promised to respect Jordan's special status in the Muslim holy places in Jerusalem. Rabin and King Hussein personally wrote the clause, stating explicitly that in negotiations on the permanent settlement, Israel will grant priority to Jordan's historic role.

Rabin and his advisers, who were reserved with regard to the Oslo agreement with Arafat, were prepared to give preference to Jordan. Shimon Peres and his advisors, on the other hand, believed that this clause was an unnecessary provocation vis-à-vis the Palestinians, who had been required to leave Jerusalem off the table during the autonomy negotiations.

In the end, Peres accepted Rabin's approach and the promise to King Hussein became an element of his own policy. Now, Netanyahu seems determined to continue along this path, which serves his apparent interest in taming the Palestinians' aspirations for a political presence in east Jerusalem.

King Hussein, for his part, is ambivalent on the issue. Despite the ascendancy of the Palestinians as the leader in negotiations over the West Bank, he retains a strong historic link to east Jerusalem as the scion of the Hashemite Royal House. In practical terms, this means that he wants a say in the negotiations on the permanent disposition of the holy places and that he is displeased with the Palestinians' desire to create facts on the ground. At the same time, King Hussein cannot be preceived in the Arab world as competing with the Palestinians. He also believes that any Palestinian gains in Jerusalem — even if contrary to the promise in his treaty with Israel — ultimately serve the Arab interest.

The same ambivalence was present in King Hussein's attitude to the Rabin-Peres government throughout the Israeli-Palestinian negotiations. King Hussein was pleased with progress on that front, which he believed would contribute to stability inside Jordan and would allow him to sign a peace treaty with Israel. But he also feared the strengthening of the Palestinians, his historic rivals for control over the West Bank. This duality has now been carried over in his early reaction to the Netanyahu government. On the one hand, he sees the Likud as a potential partner, due to its preference for Jordan over the Palestinians. On the other hand, he is unsure about the Likud's commitment to continuing the peace process, especially on the Palestinian track.

Jerusalem is a critical and contentious issue in the peace negotiation — not just between Arabs and Israelis, but among the Arabs themselves. There are four Arab parties competing for special status there — Morocco, Saudi Arabia, Jordan and the Palestinians. For this reason alone, some Israeli negotiators believed that Israel should refrain from conferring special status on any one party at an early stage. It isn't clear if Netanyahu made any further verbal promises to King Hussein when they met privately. But it was King Hussein who made a strong statement on Jerusalem in their joint press conference. He said he did not contemplate a division of the city, but rather preferred an arrangement that would allow all three religions to find their appropriate expression in it. This statement was an important signal to Israelis, but it was no less a signal to the Palestinians.

The new Israeli mosaic

Anyone walking in Tel Aviv, Haifa or Jerusalem these days is struck by the many "non-Jewish" faces on the street. In fact, over the past few years Israel has seen an influx of non-Jews seeking work.

By Morton Weinfeld

These non-Jews are often recruited on work contracts, from countries in eastern Europe, sub-Saharan Africa and the Far East — countries like Cambodia, Thailand and the Philippines. Others come as tourists and then work illegally. Women work as nannies and elder-care workers, men as contract laborers in construction or agriculture. These workers do the jobs which native Israelis cannot or will not do, in much the same way that they fit into labor markets in western Europe. Estimates about the number of such Israeli guest workers, illegal and legal, reach as high as 250,000.

It is almost impossible to find an Israeli of any political stripe who is upbeat about this development.

Some Israelis lament the fact that these guest and illegal workers are in fact displacing Arab workers from the territories who need their Israeli jobs as a basis for their own survival and for the economic growth of the region. Festering unemployment among Palestinians can breed further resentment and disenchantment with the peace process. Of course, the security risks attached to increasing Palestinian employment make non-Arab workers all the more attractive.

Other Israelis are concerned with the impact of such potential immigrants on the Jewish character of the state. At least the West Bank Arabs would not seek to become Israeli citizens and many could return home in the evenings. What would Israel do with so many Israeli citizens who are not Jewish? Some fear that admitting some as legal residents might lead to an explosion of immigration to Israel from all over the developing world.

Israel has no experience with large numbers of non-Jews (leave aside the case of Palestinians and Arab refugees or the non-Jewish spouses of legal Soviet Jewish immigrants) seeking to settle in the country. Israelis fear that they would tend to congregate in "ghettos" and never integrate into Israeli society.

Ironically, most Israelis admit that the foreign workers meet the work expectations of their employers. As for crime, with the exception of an alleged concentration of prostitutes of eastern European-origin and some drunken rowdiness on the part of east European workers, complaints are minimal.

Of course non-Jewish immigrants settling in Israel would cluster in their own areas. This is not a new pattern in Israel, where Arabs, Haredim, North African Jews and European Jewish immigrants also tend to segregate themselves residentially. In fact, this is also the rule in countries like Canada and the United States, where we are all familiar with persisting neighborhoods based on ethnicity and race.

The success of any immigrant integration process is seen in the fate of the second or third generation, the children and grandchildren of immigrants. What would be the fate of these non-Jewish immigrants and their children, should they be eventually granted Israeli citizenship?

No one knows. One scenario would suggest that their parents would continue to work and pay taxes in Israel, their children would go to Israeli schools, be fluent in Hebrew, serve in the army. But could Israeli society come to accept the notion of Thais as legitimate Israelis, similar to Moroccan, Russian, Yemenite and German Jews? A key problem for many is that Thai Israelis would be non-Jewish and might intermarry with Jewish Israelis.

What no one knows is how much intermarriage would take place and what percentage of the marriage would be accompanied by a conversion to Judaism. The Diaspora experience is a poor guide, since Jews there have always been in the numerical minority.

Some people might argue that Israel has still not finished the arduous task of integrating Jewish immigrants and the challenge of non-Jewish immigrants would be too great. Perhaps. But Israel will have to make some unpleasant choices, including forcefully evicting illegal workers, ending foreign worker contracts, or accepting Palestinian workers with accompanying security risks, if she wishes to avoid these new problems. Like it or not, Israel finds herself part of the global population system.

Olympic Games 1936

Now that the Atlanta Games are over, with their medal count, endless hype, thrilling moments and sad memories of terror in the Olympic Park, I remember the Games of 1936, held in Berlin.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

It was the time of Hitler and his thugs, and the event was to showcase the marvels of the Third Reich. I had already emigrated to the United States, but as an active athlete, I followed the news coverage avidly. Commercial TV did not exist as yet, and I didn't own a radio; so I learned everything from the newspaper. In fact, I don't know what kind of reports were broadcast at the time.

But one thing I did know (or thought I knew): there would be no Jews participating, certainly not for Germany. One of my friends was Liesl Jacob, German javelin champion who, before emigrating to South Africa, won the javelin competition at the Maccabi Games we attended in Tel Aviv. Another German champion was Gretel Bergmann, who had won the Olympic trials in the high jump and had then been informed that she would be excluded because, so the letter from the Sports Ministry stated, "Your performance was not up to our standards" (an example of the infamous double talk in which the Nazis were so adept). But to show their "good will," and in order to let the international community know of their "fairness," the Nazis offered Gretel, who had meanwhile emigrated to England, a free standing-room ticket to the Games — which she refused.

In 1996, 60 years later, a new Germany, anxious to undo the injury done to her, made Bergmann (who is about my age) an honorary member of the German team and presented her and her husband with free admission to the Atlanta Games. I saw her on TV when she was interviewed by NBC, a handsome woman who now lives in the United States. She appreciated the gesture of the present German government, she said, though she could never forget how her youthful Olympic dream had been shattered.

But the Nazis were successful in luring Helene Mayer back from the States where she had immigrated, so that she could represent Germany in fencing. Mayer had a Jewish father, and the Nazis defined her as a Jew. She accepted, believing that perhaps the Nazis were relaxing their anti-Semitic practices. She won the silver medal, while the gold was won by a fully Jewish woman from Hungary, Ilona Elek; and another Jew, Ellen Preis from Austria, won the bronze. (The picture of the three winners appeared in the July 25 issue of the Jerusalem Report, which however identified only Mayer; the other names were given me by Fred Rose of Toronto).

The great hero of the Games was, of course, American Jesse Owens, a black multi-winner, who ran, not only against his fellow competitors, but against Hitler himself, proving the latter's dream of white supremacy nothing but a stupid illusion. I wonder what he and his cohorts would have thought of the Atlanta teams that represented the United States and Canada in track and field.

The Kirshner File

The passing parade...

They died recently, leaving footprints in time ...

Julian Stryjkowski, regarded as one of Poland's greatest post-war novelists, wrote a series of novels about Jewish life in Poland before the Holocaust. His best-known works, Voices in the Dark and Austeria, were translated into many languages, including Yiddish and Hebrew.

Born in Galicia, Stryjkowski rejected the Orthodox Jewish values of his parents and joined the Communist party, viewing Communism as "the only way to resolve the Jewish question." He was to be bitterly disappointed. Stryjkowski, a journalist after World War II, left the Communist party in 1966. In his final years, he was associated with the Solidarity movement, which toppled the Communist regime in 1989.

Joseph Green produced and co-directed four of the greatest films of the Yiddish cinema — Yidl Mitn Fidl (1935), Der Purimspiler (1937), Mamele (1938) and Brievele der Mamen (1938). Born in Lodz, Green made these classics in Poland. Asked why he stopped making pictures after 1938, he replied: "I have only one answer. Six million potential moviegoers were missing (after the Holocaust)."

Mel Allen (Israel), the congenial voice of the New York Yankees for nearly 25 years and then the host of This Week in Baseball, coined the expression "going, going, gone." A member of the Baseball Hall of Fame, he broadcast 20 World Series and 24 All-Star games.

Marjorie Gross, a comedy writer and producer, was one of the brains behind the TV series Seinfeld. A Torontonian, she was previously associated with the sitcom Square Pegs.

Ross Hunter, the Hollywood producer, churned out 60 films, romantic comedies, tearjerkers and musicals, during his fertile career. Born in Cleveland as Martin Fuss, he began as an actor in low-cost B movies. Among his most notable films were Magnificent Obsession, Pillow Talk, Airport, Imitation of Life, Flower Drum Song, Thoroughly Modern Millie and Lost Horizon. "I gave the public what they wanted," he said. "A chance to dream, to live vicariously, to see beautiful women, jewels, gorgeous clothes, melodrama."

Saul Bass, a graphic designer, created a new genre in cinema: the compelling opening credit sequence of a major film. The son of a New York City furrier, Bass had the knack of designing memorable, free-standing openers. He devised the segmented body for Anatomy of a Murder; the deconstructed arm for The Man With the Golden Arm; the black cats for Walk on the Wild Side; and the aerial view of Manhattan for West Side Story. More recently, Bass designed the sequences for such hits as Cape Fear, Broadcast News, Casino, The Age of Innocence and Goodfellas.

David Opatoshu, the son of Yiddish novelist Joseph Opatoshu, was a character actor who was equally at home in film, television and the stage. Among his movie credits were Exodus, The Brothers Karamazov, The Fixer, Torn Curtain and The Light Ahead, a Yiddish film directed by Edgar Ulmer. He appeared in a number of Broadway plays, notably Golden Boy and Silk Stockings. On TV, he had roles in Perry Mason, Kojak and Star Trek.

Martin Balsam, an Oscar winning character actor, won his greatest recognition in two roles — as a down-to-earth businessman in A Thousand Clowns (1965), for which he received the Academy Award for best supporting actor, and as a doomed detective in Psycho (1960), Alfred Hitchcock's shocker. The son of a New York garment manufacturer, Balsam made his film debut in On the Waterfront, with Marlon Brando. On Broadway, he won a Tony in the 1967 play You Know I Can't Hear You When The Water's Running.

Jack Weston had a 40-year career in film, TV and theatre. He appeared in such films as Cactus Flower, Please Don't Eat the Daisies and Wait Until Dark. On stage, he will be remembered for his roles in The Ritz and California Suite.

Raphael Blau was a scriptwriter whose greatest claim to fame was his association with Bedtime for Bonzo, a 1951 film starring Ronald Reagan as a psychology professor who tries to prove that environment determines personality. But Blau also collected kudos for Fear Strikes Out, a 1957 movie about a professional baseball player who suffers a nervous breakdown.

Leo Shull was a Broadway denizen and the publisher of the gossipy Show Business, which he started in 1941 as a mimeographed sheet for those who cared about the theatre. With Show Business a resounding success, he launched a dozen other entertainment-related periodicals, chiefly Casting Guide, Who's Where and The Summer Theatre Directory.

Paul Steiner, a Jewish refugee from Nazi-occupied Austria, was the first publishing packager in the United States. Packagers dream up ideas for books, hire writers, illustrators and photographers and then distribute the books under the imprimatur of an established publisher. Steiner specialized in large, lavish coffee-table books, which are more often displayed than read. His greatest success came in the 1970s when he assembled the National Audubon Society's Field Guide.

Morton Gould, one of the finest American composers of his generation, published more than 1,000 pieces: symphonies, ballets, musicals and movie scores. Last year, he won the Pulitzer Prize for String Music. He composed the background music of Holocaust, the acclaimed 1978 television series.

Judith Eisenstein, a composer and musicologist, published Gateway to Jewish Song, geared to children, as well as seven cantatas on Jewish themes, the most frequently performed of which is What is Torah. From 1929 to 1954, she taught music education and the history of Jewish music at the Jewish Theological Seminary's Teacher's Institute (now known as the Albert A. List College of Jewish Studies) in Manhattan. The eldest daughter of Rabbi Mordecai Kaplan, the founder of Reconstructionist Judaism, she was reportedly the first woman to have a bat mitzvah (1922).

Murray Goldblatt, a distinguished Canadian reporter, taught journalism at Carleton University in Ottawa until his retirement in 1991. A native of Hamilton, he worked for a succession of newspapers — the Oshawa Times-Gazette, the Ottawa Citizen, the Toronto Star and the Globe and Mail (where he was national editor and Ottawa bureau chief). Goldblatt was also a founding member, then president, of the Ottawa local of the Newspaper Guild.

Dan Wolf was a founding editor of The Village Voice, an iconoclastic New York weekly which blended advocacy and personal journalism, backed the civil rights movement and opposed U.S. involvement in the Vietnam war. In 1970, when its circulation had climbed to 50,000, he sold his shares in the newspaper. Later, Wolf was an advisor to Edward Koch, the mayor of New York.

Richard Clurman, a prominent newspaperman, plunged into journalism in 1946 as an assistant editor on the monthly magazine Commentary, published by the American Jewish Committee. In 1949, he joined Time, the weekly newsmagazine. Rising steadily in the ranks, he became head of the Time-Life News Service, supervising a staff of 105 correspondents in the United States and abroad. In 1992, he wrote To the End of Time: The Seduction and Conquest of the World's Largest Media Empires, an account of the merger between Time and Warner Communications.

Rabbinic Reflections

The mazel factor

By RABBI JOSEPH KELMAN

The recent convention in Toronto of 13,000 psychologists reminded me that for years, there has been an ongoing discussion about what is the most important influence in the development of an individual. Is it heredity or environment? The obvious answer is that both are major factors. And on top of that, it helps to have a little mazel.

Ideally, part of the Jewish person's personality in North America should be defined by the Jewish component. We are certainly very conscious of this as we get ready for the High Holy Days and come to the synagogue, hopefully, to get inspiration for the rest of the year. In North America, especially after World War II, the synagogue became the focal point, as well as an important teaching agency, in helping Jewish families observe the mitzvot.

In the Shema is the injunction: "You shall teach your children." The synagogue is an important part of the environment that can help mould Jewish personalities. This is in keeping with the statement in Pirkei Avot: "Get a rabbi or teacher for yourself and acquire proper friends." The contemporary synagogue, with the guidance of the rabbi and the example of our fellow members, plays a vital role in helping Jewish families with the observance of Judaism inside and outside the home. This applies not only to children but also to adults.

The importance of the overall influence of the synagogue on the entire family was brought home to me recently, when I heard Prof. Morton Weinfeld quote a classic description of one of the problems facing Jewish life in recent years.

Far too often, the emphasis has been on what he and others have called "pediatric Judaism" — making sure that our children have a bar/bat mitzvah, know how to recite the four questions at Passover and sing Chanukah songs.

Probably close to 100 percent of Jewish children whose parents belong to a synagogue have a bar/bat mitzvah, as do the children of a goodly percentage of non-synagogue members. Parents and grandparents shep a great deal of nachas and feel that they have done enough to live up to their Judaic responsibility but are not necessarily proper role models for their children.

It would be interesting, however, to find out how many of these parents attend synagogue regularly afterwards, participate in adult education classes and observe the rituals and customs in their home.

As we approach the High Holy Days, adults have to make strong resolutions to maintain and/or improve upon their commitment to the Jewish way of life. I am an optimist and am convinced that Judaism will survive in North America and Israel, but the same question remains year after year: To what extent will the Jewish adult fulfil the basic commitment to Jewish life? The High Holy Days are a time of tshuvah, which can be translated as repentance and return.

All synagogues can help their member and non-member worshippers fulfil the resolve to have a greater commitment to Jewish life. As adults and parents, we have a dual responsibility — to be proper role models so that we can provide a good hereditary example to our children and at the same time, to be involved in the synagogue and the Jewish community so that the environment can likewise be a positive factor for our families.

Let us hope that the coming year, because of the partnership of our own efforts and the will of the Almighty, will bring the blessings of good health, peace and prosperity for all as individuals and klal Yisrael.

Argentinian inquiry frustrates

Guest Voices

By JACK SILVERSTONE

Two at a time, the 86 names of those who perished in the terrorist bombing of the AMIA Jewish community building on July 18, 1994, in Buenos Aires were read aloud. Two thousand Argentines, most of them Jewish, gathered on the second anniversary in narrow Pasteur Street, where the building stood and where so many lives were cruelly taken.

A heart-rending poem and a tear-choked Spanish speech demanding that the perpetrators be brought to justice sounded over the loudspeakers. Visiting American Jewish leader Rabbi Alexander Schindler, whose meeting in Argentina was a sign of solidarity, intoned the Kaddish prayer.

As I made my way up a parallel street (I was there as part of the foundation delegation), I was stopped in my tracks by a voice overwrought with grief, chanting K'El Maleh Rachamim. Unable for a moment to go on, Rabbi Menachem Porush of Israel completed the prayer. His voice drew me closer as the crowd had thinned, and I was able to approach the construction wall erected in front of the site. On it were photographs of several of the dead: a 19-year-old girl, a 21-year-old man, a 5-year-old child. And then the enormity of the tragedy suffered by the Argentine Jewish community — by far the largest in Latin America, with over 200,000 souls — overwhelmed me.

The Jewish community is frustrated and angry over the conduct of the investigation. This is compounded by the also unsolved bombing of the Israel Embassy in the Argentine capital in 1992 that caused 29 fatalities.

Two years after the terrorist outrage, a solution of the crime and the bringing to trial of the perpetrators seem very little advanced.

The arrest last week of provincial police officers who were allegedly involved in a stolen-car ring, one of whose cars, a Renault van, was used as the delivery vehicle for the huge bomb that destroyed the Jewish community edifice, confirmed the fears of many with regard to the law-enforcement authorities in Argentina. The spectre of an unholy triad of Iran, Hezbollah and corrupt anti-Semitic elements within the Argentine police and military remains a factor. The Third Attack, a recent book in Spanish by an Argentine journalist, suggests that another assault is not only possible but likely.

On the same day as the memorial service at the AMIA, the Buenos Aires newspapers ran a story about the disappearance in 1977 of a Swedish teenager in Argentina. It was finally revealed by one of the military officers involved that wrongly suspected as a terrorist, she was pushed from an airplane into the River Plata on a "death flight" in Argentina's "dirty war" against the left. An estimated 30,000 people were "disappeared."

Did we in communities outside Argentina do enough during the murderous period of the military dictatorship to call them to account? Are we doing enough in the wake of the tragedies of the two bombings, both by letting the authorities there know the world is closely following the investigation and secondly by assisting the Jewish community in its rebuilding efforts? In my discussions at the Canadian Embassy in Buenos Aires, there was certainly an awareness of the issue, but the progress of the inquiry was not on the Canada-Argentina bilateral agenda.

Buenos Aires is about a 10½-hour flight from New York. In the relative silence encountered by the Argentine community after the attacks, it might as well be 10½ years.

Jewish Life

Always act in good faith

By JAY KELMAN

We recently observed the holiday of Tisha b'Av, commemorating the destruction of the Temple. Many readers are aware that the rabbis saw the destruction as a direct result of sinat chinam — unnecessary hatred and apathy of one Jew for another.

Biz & Halachah

The Jerusalem Talmud offers a seemingly different reason: namely that the Jews loved money to excess. A temple that symbolizes spirituality cannot serve its purpose if it must compete with the god of money in such a materialistic world.

We are unfortunately aware that perhaps the greatest cause of friction amongst people stems from quarrels over money. Often these disputes result from conflicting interpretations of economic obligations. To help avert potential disputes, the Talmud recommends that all business transactions be put in writing and signed by witnesses. This applies to leases, joint ventures, employment opportunities and even loans to a friend. Implementing this practice could help avoid the vagueness and ambiguity that lead to conflicting interpretations of one's obligations.

Of course, putting all commitments in writing is not always practical; nor can every requirement be spelled out in writing. Therefore, one is expected to act in good faith to implement any oral commitments. If one verbally agrees to a sale, of a house for example, Jewish law would demand rejection of all subsequent offers, whether or not the original commitment has been put in writing. While a handshake is not legally enforceable, it serves as a moral imperative for action.

Flowing from the obligation to act in good faith is the prohibition against onaat devarim — cheating with words. This prohibition is violated when one asks about an article that one has no intention of buying. This is objectionable for two reasons. First, the vendor has a needless sense of disappointment when a sale is not made. Second, the salesperson is wasting time with someone who is not a bona fide client, while other real, potential customers are left unserved. However, comparison shopping is not problematic, as long as one has a true intention to make a purchase and other enquiries are directed toward finding the best value among competitors.

There are some practices, however, that do appear to be clearly forbidden. A stock market investor who takes advice from a full-service broker, intending to execute the order with a discount broker, is literally robbing the broker of his commission. Similarly, pricing items at a showroom to determine which item is best suited to your needs and then purchasing them through a catalogue would also be in violation of this biblical prohibition.

Another ethical issue arises in the prohibition of g'nevat daat, literally, stealing ones mind. This law is violated when a misrepresentation has taken place and a false impression is thereby created. Some examples mentioned in the Talmud include painting old utensils to make them appear as new, or selling non-kosher meat to a non-Jew who believes he is buying kosher meat that he perceived to be of better value. No price fraud takes place, but the customer is nevertheless being misled in his purchase.

The vanishing Diaspora

Vanishing Diaspora by Bernard Wasserstein, Harvard University Press $27.95 (US)

There are now about two million Jews in Europe: 750,000 in the territory of the former Soviet Union; 100,000 in the rest of Eastern Europe and the Balkans; some 530,000 in France and 280,000 in Britain.

These figures stand in sharp and shocking contrast to the 10 million Jews in Europe in 1937. Hitler's Final Solution reduced this number to four million. In 1967, the figure stood at a mere three million, largely as a result of absorption into surrounding cultures.

Bernard Wasserstein, a professor at Brandeis University and an authority on British Jewry, presents a grim picture of the future of these communities. He asserts that they are diminishing in numbers and influence and "slowly but surely fading away. Soon nothing will be left save a disembodied memory."

In this dispassionate, scholarly, country by country, era by era, survey — from Austria to Yugoslavia — the author maintains that "demographic, social, religious and cultural trends over the past half century point to the dissolution of the Diaspora in Europe." Perhaps, only a small hard core of ultra-Orthodox Jews will remain.

All the signs and indicators are negative. Apart from France and Britain, the West European Jewish communities are small and weak — without the collective will or economic means to provide for their religious and social needs. Yiddish and Ladino are dying. Even in France, the most vibrant of the communities, there is a falling away from tradition. Only 10 percent attend religious services regularly, more homes have Christmas trees than menorahs and the last Yiddish daily newspaper in the country has folded.

It is hard to believe that a thousand years of European Jewish history may be coming to an end because of unceasing assimilation, intermarriage and a low birth rate. The most widespread of Jewish practices seem to be burial, circumcision and fundraising, especially for Israel.

Even minor facts and trends embellish the bleak outlook: synagogues in Britain are being converted into mosques and churches, the Jewish fertility rate in the Netherlands is half that of the gentiles, a cemetery in Poland for pogrom victims has been turned into a soccer field, a recent birthday of the former Romanian dictator Ion Antonescu, who helped the Nazis murder over 100,000 Jews, was widely celebrated throughout the country.

The author asserts that although Israel's victory in the Six Day War led to a brief period of spiritual revival, the euphoria and religious benefits soon faded. Indeed, "in many European eyes Israel was seen as too big for its boots and as a persecutor rather than a victim." Israel, however, is still the lodestar for many restless and questing Jews, especially the Russians. Many will undoubtedly eventually immigrate to the Jewish State.

Wasserstein knows that history is replete with the unexpected, and that it is foolish to predict the future. He acknowledges also that there are positive signs for the perpetuation of European Jewry in the establishment of day schools, clubs, periodicals and camps. In Russia, there has been a revitalization of Jewish cultural and religious life, much of it supported by North American funding. Yet, the overall picture is bleak and dispiriting.

The alert and sensitive reader must recognize, with a sinking heart, that most of the negative factors for Jewish persistence and continuation in Europe are present in our North American communities as well. This well researched, lucid and comprehensive volume is a definitive work on a painful subject.

Shir Libeynu combines prayer with spirituality and social consciousness

By CINDY WAXER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – When Adrienne Rosen decided that she was spiritually unfulfilled by the Annex area's selection of traditional Jewish synagogues, she teamed up with Aviva Goldberg to form Shir Libeynu (Song of Our Heart).

Shir Libeynu is, by Canadian standards, an extremely left-wing, progressive, egalitarian shul that aims at merging Hebrew prayer with Jewish spirituality and social consciousness.

"Shir Libeynu is more of a place that will not just focus on davening, a place that will focus on tikkun olam (healing the world), social action and putting a political realm back into Judaism," says Rosen while adjusting her kippah.

Scheduled to offer services for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, Shir Libeynu has rented the auditorium at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education at Bloor and St. George Streets. Services will include group aliyot, Hebrew prayers, songs and niggunim in non-gendered English translations, and a supplement containing poetry and meditative readings.

Although a rabbi will not be present, the Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur services will both be accompanied by individuals who will assist with chazzanut.

What makes Shir Libeynu truly unconventional, however, is its insistence upon integrating the traditional aspects of Judaism with the needs of an increasingly diverse Jewish community. Gay and lesbian families, single parents and intermarried couples are all encouraged to attend, and Shir Libeynu will be offering free daycare during the High Holy Day services. In addition, after all necessary costs are covered, donations made to the shul will be distributed to charities voted on by members of the congregation.

Whereas similar Reform and Reconstructionist movements have been flourishing for some time in New York City and San Francisco, Canadian Jews are typically more conservative and have been reluctant to expand their definition of Judaism to encompass more liberal ideas.

But Aviva Goldberg, who was raised in a modern Orthodox Jewish family, does not interpret Shir Libeynu as a departure from standard Judaic practices. Rather, Goldberg regards the shul as "a response to all the positive aspects of Judaism that I was raised with."

She says these assets include "the quality of love of Judaism, of love of scholarship, of love of asking questions and finding meaning."

Goldberg and Rosen have not yet received any criticism from the general Jewish community for Shir Libeynu's policies and refashioning of particular Jewish customs.

Besides, Goldberg says, "We're not doing anything different than some men who get together and daven."

In fact, the Annex's response has been so positive that Goldberg and Rosen are expecting over 200 people to attend Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur services.

But the sole purpose behind Shir Libeynu, they say, is to foster an interactive Jewish community.

"We're starting a movement here rather than a shul. We want to start a movement and we want it to be grassroots. We want people to be involved and joyful in their Judaism," Rosen says.

The intention is, therefore, for services to be participatory, accessible to all and most importantly, subject to change. Members of the congregation will be encouraged to openly comment on the sermon, which in itself should be thought-provoking.

Bonds honors Harriet Morton

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – Harriet Morton, a Toronto-area travel consultant who has been to Israel 46 times, was honored recently for her long service to Israel and the State of Israel Bonds organization.

About 100 people attended a gala fundraising evening in of Morton's honor at the home of Dorothy and Irving Shoichet.

"Everyone who was there purchased a bond," said Rose Shapiro, director of the Women's Division of the Bonds organization. "It's not how much a person purchases that's important. We like to see everybody make a purchase, because this shows solidarity with Israel."

Morton has filled many voluntary positions for Israel Bonds over the past 20 years. As well, she is honorary vice-president of World ORT Union, sits on the boards of the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce and the Weizmann Institute and is an executive member of the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association.

"We are the builders of a dream, our beloved Israel," she told the gathering. "Our bond purchases reconfirm our pride, solidarity and commitment to Israel. With our investments, we play a major role in enhancing the world's respect for and confidence in Israel."

Morton is due to be honored in Israel in November as one of 21 distinguished women from across North America to receive the Jerusalem 3000 award for Israel Bonds.

"Israel Bonds are such an excellent investment financially and forge a link between the purchaser and Israel," said Dodi Weill, chair of the Women's Division. "Israel Bonds build the infrastructure of Israel, the roads, the water filtration plants, the electricity and the highways.

"No one has promoted this more than Harriet Morton. She is an outstanding supporter of Israel Bonds."

The evening's scheduled guest speaker, Susan Weikers-Volchok, was unable to attend for personal reasons.

New bar/bat mitzvah program launched

TORONTO — A new bar/bat mitzvah program is opening up this fall in Richmond Hill at The Country Shul at Bathurst and Carville streets.

The program will provide weekly Hebrew classes, private tutoring and extra-curricular social and educational events. All teachers and tutors have had experience working in similar programs. Their goal will be to motivate students and prepare them for "the big day."

"We want this program to be a one-stop bar/bat mitzvah shop," says director Mark Jacobs. "We realize that parents need help putting their party together; so we've created a database of information to help each family prepare for their simchah, besides offering regular classes and tutoring."

The program is affiliated with synagogues in Richmond Hill and throughout the Greater Toronto area. Space is limited.

Henig carves out niche as shul interior designer

By GIL KEZWER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Ron Henig pauses from his whirlwind activity of juggling two and three tasks at once. It's a characteristic moment for a hard-to-classify artist who bridges two worlds, one the traditional way of life of the ultra-Orthodox Jew, and the other the creative lifestyle of the craftsperson.

At the age of 41, the Toronto artist has carved out a niche as Canada's foremost synagogue interior designer. He has worked on nearly one-third of the more than 100 synagogues in Toronto, as well as several houses of worship in the United States.

So far this year, he has completed four commissions in Toronto including stained glass windows for the meditation chapel at Sick Children's Hospital, the synagogue at Sunnybrook Hospital and two North York shuls.

In late April, Henig inked the most lucrative and artistically challenging design contract of his career — a $200,000 (US) commission for the interior of B'nai Yeshurun, a $6-million shul project in Teaneck, N.J.

Ron Henig

Interviewed in his garage studio near Bathurst and Lawrence, Henig discusses his complex career. An autodidact who dropped out of architecture and then engineering after less than a semester, Henig's formal education is in Talmudic studies. But the yeshivah graduate works professionally at woodworking and cabinetry, stained and sandblasted glass, painting on silk, metal and stone sculptures, wood carving, calligraphy and graphic design.

While his art has been heavily influenced by Canada's contemporary crafts scene, it also follows ancient traditions rooted in the Jewish people's biblical homeland.

The family left Romania in 1958 and moved to Beersheva, Israel. In 1961, the family immigrated to New York. There Henig attended a private religious school in which art was simply not on the curriculum. "Art was seen as a waste of time. Anybody I told that I wanted to be an artist said, 'Artists starve.' And that perception stuck with me for many years."

Following primary school in Brooklyn, he attended a secondary school for pre-rabbinical training in Baltimore. In 1972, he transferred to Ner Israel Yeshiva's affiliate campus in Toronto from which he graduated. He then applied to architecture school at the University of Toronto.

Henig dropped out in the first semester. He tried engineering at U of T next, but withdrew when his mother was killed in a car accident.

Supported himself doing calligraphy

"I had to make a living. I supported myself by doing calligraphy for invitations and ketubot (illustrated Jewish marriage contracts) — then an ancient art form undergoing a rebirth. Before long I got a reputation and was kept very busy. That was my full-time occupation."

His first shul commission came in 1975. While he was renting a basement apartment from the president of the B'nai Torah Synagogue in North York, the shul was undergoing renovations. "They asked me to design some aspects of the interior woodwork — the Aron Kodesh, the Torah cabinet.

"A couple of years later, the same shul hired me to design their stained glass windows. That was my first stained glass commission. I had never touched glass before. But necessity is the mother of invention. They hired me to design them. I designed one of the windows at no charge. I subcontracted with an artisan and got on-the-job training. By the time we finished, I was confident enough to take on other projects."

"א-לוהים מרחם על ילדי הגן,

פחות מזה על ילדי בית הספר,

ועל הגדולים לא ירחם עוד,

ישאירם לבדם."

תייך איתן הבר את חיוכו הצנוע. היה זה הבר שכתב את כל נאומיו של רבין כולל הציטוט של "א-לוהים מרחם".

"לא רק שציטטנו את השיר של עמיחי - אמר הבר- גם הזמנתי אותו לטקס." כשהייתי בארץ שמעתי הסטוריונית מדברת ברדיו על "מורשת רבין", ענו - איך יזכרו אותו. וכך היא אמרה: "אם יקשיבו לתשובותיו הספונטניות בראיונות - יגלו את יצחק רבין. אם יקשיבו לו קורא נאומים - יגלו את איתן הבר"

שלוש מאות אלף דולאר עפים באוויר:

כל קיץ, כשהימים מתארכים עד עשר וחצי בערב, מתקיים ב- Ontario Place פסטיבל מיוחד במינו: מדינות מכל העולם מתחרות ב"פסטיבל האש", מי יצליח לשלב באופן המוצלח ביותר זיקוקי דינור ומוסיקה. וכך, לאורך חצי שעה עפות לאוויר כששת אלפים פצצות מרהיבות של זיקוקי דינור בשווי של כשלוש מאות אלף דולאר. השילוב בין המוסיקה וזיקוקי הדינור מושג כמובן על ידי תוכנית מחשב מסובכת. לפעמים התוצאה משאירה אותך פעור פה, ולפעמים נדמה לך שזוהי מוסיקת מעליות שברקע שלה עפים זיקוקי דינור. האירוע עצמו הוא בהחלט חוויה ועשרות אלפי צופים משלמים כרטיסי כניסה ועוד מאות אלפים יושבים על חוף האגם רחוק יותר לצפות בנס. האקסטרה -וַנְנַנָה הזו יכולה לצאת לפועל כל שנה רק בגלל שחברת סיגריות עקית מעניקה לה סכומי כסף של שבע ספרות. משנה לשנה, כפי שאתם בטח יודעים, יורד מספר האפשרויות של חברות הסיגריות לתת חסויות, כי רוב האירגונים הציבוריים כיום רואים טעם לפגם לקבל מענק מחברת סיגריות. אני אישית הייתי מעדיף לראות את הסכום הזה מושקע בחקר מחלות ריאה שנגרמות על ידי סיגריות, או סתם להאכיל אנשים רעבים. המחשבה שתוך חצי שעה עפים באוויר שלוש מאות אלף דולאר קצת דומה לתחושה שיש בפה כשאוכלים צמר גפן מסוכר: קצת מתוק ואחר כך לא נשאר כלום. בקשר לצד האמנותי: זיקוקי דינור הם על הכיפק ביום קנדה, או בתום הסיבוב התשיעי של משחק בייסבול כשטורונטו מנצחת. - אבל למשוך אותם שלושים דקות עם מוסיקה של מעליות - זו לבטח איננה אמנות חדשה! זוהי אמנות שטחית של חברה עשירה שרצה למשחקי הוקי ולא לקונצרטים. בשלוש מאות אלף דולאר אפשר היה לממן כל כך הרבה אמנות ואמנים אמיתיים שמשוועים לסיוע בימים קשים אלה של קיצוצים. אבל שישאר בינינו.

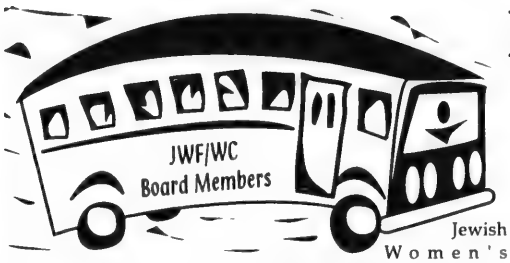
MINI-MISSION AN EYE OPENER



Twenty-five active community leaders recently boarded a bus for a tour with more than sights and sounds. The mini-mission, organized by UJA Federation Women's Campaign and Jewish Women's Federation gave participants a first hand look at growing community needs.

The group, which included Women's Campaign Chair and Vice-Chair Vicki Campbell and Agi Mandel, and Jill Reitman, President of Jewish Women's Federation, spent a day visiting community facilities funded by UJA Federation and hearing from agency representatives.

"I was absolutely floored when I heard the statistics on poverty from Jewish Family & Child Service representative Florence Weinberger," recalls Mina Schwarz, one of UJA Federation's newest volunteers. According to JF&CS, one out of every seven Toronto Jews lives below the poverty line and one in ten Jewish children under the age of 14 lives in poverty.

The group also visited two locations of the Kehila Residential Project, a UJA Federation affiliated agency, the Bernard Betel Centre and the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

"I was particularly impressed with the wide range of programs Bernard Betel runs for its seniors," says Danita Dubinsky Aziza, co-chair of Jewish Women's Federation's Community Response Project (CRP). UJA Federation funds programs at the Centre, serving 3500 seniors, including the Russian Golden Age Integration Program, daily hot lunches and Yiddish discussion meetings.

"The whole day was a very worthwhile experience," adds Sheila Smolkin, who also works on the CRP. "I was quite inspired to see what a difference our dollars are making," says Vicki Campbell. "Seeing is believing."

Summer Intern Discovers Community

Zameret Kleiman travelled a very long way before arriving at UJA Federation this summer. The 24 year old graduate of McMaster University was born in Israel, raised in Edmonton and Fort McMurray Alberta (5 hours north of Edmonton) and attended high school in Sarnia.

Zameret Kleiman

"I was always the only Jewish kid in the class when I was growing up," recalls Kleiman, who was glad to finally make the move to Toronto to pursue her career. "Even though I was able to cope I always felt different."

Since June she has been working as a fundraising intern at UJA Federation, primarily with the Arts & Entertainment Division, under a federal government grant for the Summer Career Placement Program.

While studying in Hamilton and working at a Jewish seniors home, she was given the opportunity to escort an elderly resident on a mission to Israel one summer. "I felt honoured to help fulfill this man's dream but, at the same time, it reminded me of what was missing in my life," she explains.

Feeling right at home among the A&E crowd and the hub of the Jewish community, Kleiman says "it's nice to feel like a part of a group. I really feel a void has been filled in my life."

Grateful for the opportunity to work within the Jewish community, Kleiman is ready to resume pursuing her lifelong aspiration of becoming a movie casting agent, a career she began shortly after she graduated by working for a talent agency. "I've always loved movies. I think they're a great escape," she says. "I want to be involved in casting because I think I've got a good eye for spotting the right face for the right character."

Although Kleiman is starting a new casting job, she plans to remain active as a UJA Federation volunteer. "I really believe in UJA Federation and I'm certain I'll be back."

UJA Federation Aids Quebec Flood Victims

UJA Federation has added its name to the list of organizations sending aid to flood victims in Quebec's Saguenay-Lac St. Jean region.

UJA Federation, along with Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, decided to join Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec Region, and Montreal's FEDERATION CJA in providing help through the Red Cross.

"We feel tremendous empathy for the flood victims and thought this would be a good way for us to show our support," noted Sandra Brown, UJA Federation President.

Civil protection authorities estimate that the flood, which killed 10 people and drove thousands from their homes, has caused close to $450 million damage to the region.

Her Business is Lost and Found

The phone rings in Batya Unterschatz's office and after answering it in Hebrew, she switches to Russian. "Those were some new immigrants from Tashkent," she explains, "who want me to look for their great aunt, who they claim was kidnapped from Jerusalem some 50 years ago and taken back to Uzbekistan."

The numerous letters on Unterschatz's desk all tell similar strange tales of missing relatives spread out across the world. As Director of the UJA Federation funded Jewish Agency for Israel's Search Bureau for Missing Relatives, it's her job to help find them.

Some 400 Jews from around the world contact the bureau each year either through mail, telephone or fax. A few even come in person to the bureau's Jerusalem offices.

"We had 800 people a year," she reports, "when the massive wave of aliya from the Soviet Union started in 1990, and we've paired many relatives who had not seen each other since World War II." She claims a 60 per cent success rate in locating lost loved ones.

Unterschatz, who immigrated to Israel from Riga, Latvia in 1971, and speaks nine languages, is part detective, part psychologist and a member of the International Society of Professional Genealogists.

Today most applications to the bureau come from the West, but one in particular stands out in Unterschatz's mind.

Batya Unterschatz

A Jewish Englishman from London was told that he had been adopted and began to search for his natural mother - an Austrian Jewish refugee who was brought to England in the "kindertransport." The young woman had become pregnant but after her boyfriend was killed in the war, she gave her baby up for adoption by a Jewish family.

Unterschatz located the man's aunt, who, although reluctant at first, agreed to meet her nephew in Jerusalem and reveal her sister's address. Eventually the son was reunited with his mother.

Unterschatz predicts her services will remain in demand. "Family ties are the essence of the Jewish culture and religion," she observes, "and there will always be Jews wanting to trace their family."

Sacks Set Example for Community

When it comes to believing in community, brothers Richard and Barry Sacks think a lot alike. Not only do they work together in an accounting firm they began in 1991, they share strong Jewish values instilled in them by parents who were Holocaust survivors.

Richard Sacks

Barry Sacks

"We have a tremendous community," says Richard, 48, who is eight years older than his brother. Richard says his love for the community and his strong Jewish upbringing are the reasons why he has supported UJA Federation and other charities for 25 years.

"My brother and I are children of survivors and we'll never forget what our parents went through to make a life for us here in Canada," he explains.

In addition to UJA Federation, the elder Sacks has been involved with Baycrest, Israel Bonds, the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem and Reena.

"UJA Federation is like motherhood and apple pie," he says. "I know that my gift is going to all the right places."

AT THE JEWISH SINGLES REGISTRY
KISS BLIND DATING GOOD-BYE

It has happened to all of us. A well-meaning friend or relative sets you up on a blind date with someone who is "absolutely perfect for you". You arrange to meet, take the time to get ready and on the way over you allow yourself to think – for just a moment – that maybe this might be the one. But a few minutes after meeting your date you realize that the person is nothing like your friend described, that you have nothing in common, and that you'd have been better off spending the night at home. It's disappointing, frustrating - and it doesn't have to be that way!

Information is key

The whole premise behind the Jewish Singles Registry is to provide registrants with all the information necessary to make informed and quality dating choices. Members get to view very detailed and comprehensive biography profiles on each other. A photograph attached to each file completes the "picture", and eliminates the blind date factor. Members have been joining in record numbers, and with close to 1100 registrants the selection of compatible biographies has never been greater. The concept is so successful that the Registry averages an engagement every 6 weeks. Whether you are looking for friendship, a long term relationship, or something in between, The Jewish Singles Registry has someone right for you. Call us today at (416) 398-7068.

New project explores Jewish healing

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — How does Judaism assist people who are physically ill? That question has led rabbis, social workers, doctors, artists, teachers and others to identify a need in the Jewish community: the need to learn more about Jewish healing.

Toronto Rabbi Dow Marmur and a group of concerned people met several times to discuss that. The result: the Toronto Jewish Healing Project.

This spring, social work consultant Jack Kugelmass and Rabbi Nancy Wechsler led the first group of individuals seeking spiritual comfort.

Jewish healing refers to "something deep inside the human spirit that makes us feel connected to our feelings, the people we love, our community, values, needs and goals," Kugelmass said.

Judaism, he added, makes it possible to develop a deeper experience and understanding of our feelings, thoughts, emotions and ideas through the study of the sacred texts, rabbinic commentary, midrash, rituals and stories.

Project chair Etta Ginsberg McEwan said the group learned from the Jewish healing centres in New York and San Francisco that Judaism has an enormous amount to say about illness and spiritual healing.

She said many participants in the pilot project felt the sessions were helpful and they want to continue to be part of subsequent groups.

Through the Healing Project, Kugelmass said, "it is hoped that persons who are physically ill will find meaning and will be provided with comfort for themselves and others in their time of need."

The group is not affiliated with any particular stream of Judaism, but focuses on addressing human needs through the lens of Judaism. Kugelmass stressed that it is not a substitute for any medicine or an alternate health treatment.

The pilot program included singing, checking on how the last week had been and personal reflection based on the study of the text, Rabbi Wechsler said. Most of the sessions included the presentation of a spiritual tool that could be practised during the following week.

She described the songs sung in the group as "Jewish healing music."

Ginsberg McEwan said the group is now planning fall/winter programs.

"The Jewish Healing Project hopes to offer a similar series of three groups: a spiritual support group for those coping with physical illness; a spiritual support group for caregivers; and a spiritual support group for health care professionals."

"Perhaps in the future, there will be a fourth group — a spiritual support group for rabbis who counsel those who are ill," Rabbi Wechsler added.

UJPO's Camp Naivelt marks 70th anniversary

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In the early part of this century, Jewish immigrants from eastern Europe working in sweatshops and living in cramped quarters in downtown needed a refuge in the country.

Camp Naivelt was established as a haven for such families by the United Jewish People's Order (UJPO), a secular Jewish organization. It will be marking its 70th anniversary with a camp reunion banquet on Aug. 24 at its site in Brampton.

The camp moved to its permanent home on the shores of the Credit River in Brampton 60 years ago. UJPO members contributed $5 each for a share in the property, borrowing the money from their credit union to raise funds for the down payment and some 90 cottages were built on the site near the children's camp in the late '40s and early '50s.

Molly Myers, 84, a UJPO executive member, has spent the last 54 summers at Naivelt and has the distinction of being the oldest resident in the cottage community.

At a recent bonfire at Naivelt, Myers said in an interview that the camp has special memories for her, because that's where she met her late husband, Chaim. She still uses the same cottage he built out of a wooden plane crate some 50 years ago.

Naivelt has changed significantly over the years. The children's overnight camp closed in the mid '60s, followed by the day camp in 1970. Half of the original property was sold and nobody swims or goes boating in the Credit River any more. But the cottage community has survived and most of the cottages, which are very rustic and in various states of repair, are occupied.

Naivelt is undergoing a renewal, according to Ann Pohl, chair of the camp committee. Pohl, a secular Jew from Pennsylvania who settled in Toronto in 1968, began going to Naivelt eight years ago with her four children.

At that time, the Naivelt cottage community was in decline: many of the cottages were vacant, as their aging owners were no longer able to spend time there, Pohl said.

In recent years, more cottages became available and younger people began purchasing or renting them. For the first time, the cottages were available for short-term rental this year, Pohl said. This summer, 70 cottages are occupied, mostly by families with young children, she said.

The parents cooperatively run an activity club for about 60 children, with programs including arts and crafts and story-telling. On weekends, Naivelt holds lectures and discussion groups linked to Jewish humanistic themes as well as concerts on Saturday nights.

Every weekend this summer is booked, Pohl said. "This is the first time we've had a program that has been full in many years."

UJPO executive coordinator, Lee Schecter, who has been connected to Naivelt since 1933 when she was a camper, described it as a "thriving place" with a "strong Yiddish culture" during its heyday in the late '40s and early '50s.

Russian woman lauds aliyah experience

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — On a recent vacation, Anna Shulman's boyfriend of several years looked at her as if seeing her for the first time. "Look at you — you look Israeli," he exclaimed.

After three years of living in Israel, the 23-year-old native of St. Petersburg, Russia, has not only adopted the trendy fashions popular among Israeli youth, but she has begun to "feel like an Israeli."

The story of Shulman's aliyah at the age of 20 has turned out to be such a success that Keren Hayesod (the fundraising arm for the Jewish Agency) and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto/United Jewish Appeal co-sponsored a recent visit to the Toronto area so she could speak to youngsters at camps Moshava, Ramah and Shalom about her experience.

Shulman, an articulate Hebrew University of Jerusalem student with a ready smile, figures her stories are probably more relevant to young Jews in the former Soviet Union, but issues of adjusting to a new culture and missing family are universal themes.

As a child in Russia, Shulman knew she was Jewish and that her parents wanted her to marry someone Jewish, but her home was devoid of both Jewish culture and religious practice.

It wasn't until she entered the University for Economics in St. Petersburg in 1990 and became friendly with other Jewish students that she first attended a synagogue service. "I was shocked. I didn't have any [background], but I so liked Jewish culture. It's my culture."

The Jewish Agency had only recently established a presence in the Soviet Union. Shulman and her friends began learning about their heritage and working at fledgling Jewish camps and clubs. "We were the first in our city to work in the Jewish movement," she recalls.

The local shaliach was the first Israeli Shulman had ever met. If all Israelis were like him, she figured, Israel must be a good country.

She had a chance to see for herself in the summer of 1992, when a group of 20 young Jewish leaders were sent on a two-month educational tour to Israel.

Anna Shulman

On her return to Russia, Shulman found herself depressed for the first time. "The difference was so big."

She decided she wanted to learn Hebrew and move to Israel.

Although she doesn't miss life in Russia, she misses her parents and 10-year-old brother and has been back to see them three times. "It's difficult for me, but not so difficult that I will leave."

The support of friends was an important component in her adjustment. Ten of them made the move together and spent the first six months on a kibbutz studying Hebrew. "It was better. We shared our problems."

To ease the way for their parents, the olim had introduced them at a pre-aliyah party. Three years later, they are still in contact.

Shulman has had to get used to — among other things — the direct speaking manner of Israelis. She wants to become familiar with the Hebrew literature that her Israeli peers studied in school, but still finds it difficult.

At first, she worried about how her boyfriend, whom she had met in a Jewish club, would adjust when he followed her from Russia a year after her aliyah.

But things have worked out. Fellow students, including native Israelis, have been friendly and helpful. She has found employment at the Jewish Agency coordinating programs for parents of olim.

Following her trip to Toronto, Shulman was off to Russia to work for a month at a camp for Jewish children. Perhaps she will be the first Israeli they meet and they will conclude, as she did, that Israel must be a good place.

Ottawa: a hot spot for Jewish life

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Canada's capital, often thought of as a cold, sleepy town of bureaucrats, is becoming one of the nation's hottest centres of Jewish life.

Few communities can boast of having doubled their size in the past dozen years, but in Ottawa and its surrounding municipalities — 12 years ago home to 7,000 Jews — the Jewish population is now hovering at the 14,000 mark and the area is poised to eclipse Winnipeg as Canada's fourth largest Jewish centre.

The capital is the country's second-fastest growing Jewish community (after Toronto), and that's translated into a veritable beehive of Jewish activity.

The sudden and dramatic surge in numbers has brought both headaches and joy. Having more people has meant more services, more programming, increased synagogue membership and most important, more Jewish education in a system that's been bursting at the seams for years.

In a city where Muslims outnumber Jews and there are no distinct Jewish neighborhoods, Ottawa boasts two kosher bakeries, a kosher butcher and fish shop, and five kosher caterers. Even the venerable Chateau Laurier Hotel has a kosher kitchen. And the mayor, Jacquelin Holzman, is Jewish.

As community leader Lawrence Greenberg, whose uncle Lorry was Ottawa's first Jewish mayor, puts it, "We no longer look to Toronto as the be-all and end-all of Jewish life."

In 1858, fur-trader and pedlar Moses Bilsky became the first Jew to settle in Ottawa, then known as Bytown. Bilsky left to prospect in California but returned in 1869. By 1881, the Jewish population was 20 and a decade after that, Bilsky and John Dover helped found the Adath Jeshurun Synagogue on King Edward Avenue.

Today, Ottawa boosters point to quality of life, access to schools and services and the close proximity to bubbies and zaydes still in Montreal. Over the past decade, the city has seen a large influx of families from Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver, drawn by lower housing costs and a slower pace. There are also about 100 Sephardi families.

"We don't go by numbers," explains Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Machzikei Hadas Congregation, Ottawa's largest Orthodox synagogue. "We go by level of activity, which feels like there are 30,000 Jews here."

Rabbi Bulka points out that 2,000 people turned out for a memorial service for slain Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin. "That's 15 percent of the whole community," he says. "That's as if over 20,000 came in Toronto."

Lawrence Greenberg

Perhaps the best barometer of the boom here can be gauged by the proposed Jewish Community Campus, envisioned as an expansive, one-stop shopping centre of Jewish services. Currently, some 850 children use a single, 30-year-old building, at staggered times, for the city's top four day and afternoon schools. But ambitious plans call for two more buildings on 12 acres to house a new Jewish Community Centre; Hillel Lodge, the community's senior citizens' residence; the Vaad Ha'ir, Ottawa's central Jewish organization; a mikvah; and, it's hoped, some of the services now in the run-down community centre on Chapel Street.

The central Jewish address — a longtime dream — will be 881 Broadview Ave., on a quiet side street in the west end.

"It will be like one big happy family," enthuses Zelaine Shinder, chair of Ottawa's Board of Jewish Education. "The idea is to have all the Jewish components on one site."

Rabbi Bulka agrees: "It will be the embodiment of the Jewish belief of integrating the ages. Young and old will be together. It's really the beginning of the centralizing of the community."

Another indicator of Ottawa Jewry's commitment is that a capital campaign launched in May to raise $13 million for the campus (or nearly $1,000 per person) has already come up with $9 million, solely from personal pledges.

"The fact we're doing this campaign in this economy is itself incredible," says Greenberg, president of the Vaad Ha'ir (literally, city council). "But by the end of August, we will have raised $13 million. People say we're crazy, but we don't have a choice. We need a place Jews will call home."

A good deal of the money, Greenberg concedes, has come from the city's top Jewish families — the Vereds, the Nadolnys and his own.

But it's not all roses, he adds. "This city is suffering tremendously. It's taken the brunt of 45,000 federal job cuts. And construction and real estate, in which Jews have a history, are in the doldrums."

Nevertheless, the community is chiefly volunteer-driven and there's a high level of involvement. Greenberg is hard on himself as head of the community, "because I no longer know everybody."

That kind of small-town familiarity, however, still exists in the rabbinic realm, at least. Rabbi Bulka and his half-dozen Orthodox, Conservative and Reform colleagues regularly get together to address spiritual and communal matters.

"It's a loose group and it's all very cordial," says Rabbi Bulka, who hosts a popular Sunday night radio show, Religion on the Air, and serves as chaplain for the central Dominion Command of the Royal Canadian Legion.

He describes the community as "large-T Traditional. In general, there's a strong sense of tradition. And there's always been a sense of involvement, of ownership. Those who were on the outside are now on the inside."

Some institutions are in plain view: Ottawa is home to Israel's embassy; there are on-campus Jewish groups at Carleton and the University of Ottawa; and the domestic Israeli lobby, the Canada-Israel Committee, is headquartered here. As well, rumors persist that Canadian Jewish Congress' community relations committee will relocate here from Toronto.

In addition to the four main schools — Hillel Academy, Akiva High School, Talmud Torah Afternoon School and Ottawa Modern Jewish School — there are a number of smaller educational programs, including those run by Lubavitch and the Reform temple. JET — Jewish Education through Torah — is for adults. Earlier this year, a smaller co-ed program was renamed Yitzhak Rabin High School.

It all adds up, Rabbi Bulka proudly notes, to over 1,000 Ottawa kids getting some form of Jewish education.

What's been driving this enviable boom? "Simple," the rabbi smiles. "You can't take the future of Judaism for granted."

Language dispute erupts at JGH

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Last Friday's emotionally charged face off between Quebec anglophones and nationalists at the Jewish General Hospital (JGH) ended with Gilles Rhéaume, vice-president of the Mouvement Souverainiste du Québec, backing away from his initial stand that patients at the hospital couldn't get treated in French.

Rhéaume made his complaint and organized a vigil at the JGH after Radio-Canada journalist Norman Lester reported that a JGH nurse had refused to speak to him in French.

Even after the Office de la Langue Française (OLF) cleared the JGH of wrongdoing and called the incident isolated, the mouvement went ahead with its vigil.

Rhéaume softened his stand, however, after touring the hospital with JGH director Henri Elbaz and seeing for himself that the visibility and use of French at the hospital was "better than the federal government's."

Still, the whole incident did little to quell the sense of newly aroused linguistic tension between the provincial government and anglophones, fueled by activist Howard Galganov's campaign to stand up for English language rights.

For the Jewish community, the JGH incident set off alarm bells for some members and left Jewish organizations of mixed minds over what strategy to use to deal with it.

Both B'nai Brith (BB) and Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) fielded phone calls from members of the community asking them how they planned to respond to Rhéaume.

Both organizations made it clear that Rhéaume and his group would have held the vigil at any of Montreal's other "anglophone" hospitals — such as Royal Victoria or the Montreal General — had the incident occurred there. The fact that it was the JGH was just a matter of pure chance.

Still, B'nai Brith director Robert Libman said calls he received expressed concern that the Jewish community was being deliberately targeted, especially given the timing for the vigil, just before the onset of Shabbat.

Last Friday, before the vigil, BB effectively made a "Jewish community response" by issuing a statement saying it was trying to reassure members of the community, "many of whom expressed concern."

"Their [the mouvement's] real motives must be questioned," the statement said, if the vigil takes place "even after the [OLF] has cleared the hospital."

CJC-Q responded to public and media calls but decided to issue no statement, preferring to stay in contact with Elbaz during the week to monitor the situation.

CJC-Q director Jack Jedwab said CJC-Q received several calls, only "one or two" of which expressed the feeling that there was a campaign to target the Jewish community.

"The feeling was not to give any credibility or importance to a man who was already discredited by the OLF and is seen as an extremely marginal figure," he said.

El Al moves to Toronto

Toronto-to-Tel-Aviv flights in June, 1995.

The Jewish population of Montreal, with El Al flights to Israel since 1970, has remained static, at 100,000, while Toronto, with its El Al flights Israel-bound since 1985, has mushroomed to 160,000.

Nechushtan, 61, stressed that El Al's Canadian operations have remained profitable and competitive for the 10th straight year, despite having to now share the Canada-Israel corridor with Air Canada and international carriers offering flights via Europe.

Nechushtan says El Al lost "from 10 to 15 percent" of its Canadian traffic to Israel since Air Canada entered the field, down to a 58 percent share of the market (23,000 of 40,000 passengers).

"We expected overall traffic to increase [with the Air Canada flights], but that did not happen," he said.

Nechushtan promised El Al will continue to be the "major player" in the field by offering a range of incentives and perks for its clientele, equally divided between individual and group fliers.

New air fares, between Sept. 27 and March 31, "will never be so low," he promised.

Montrealer travels world photographing shuls

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Some people collect teaspoons or salt and pepper shakers when they travel.

Leo Paul Dana adds to his collection of photos of synagogues off the beaten path — active and defunct. He's very thorough about it, too. He can boast that he recently visited every synagogue in Bulgaria, and all but one in Moldova.

In 1993-94, he made a documentary film of his tour of approximately 100 former synagogues in Poland. He's been on all continents, except Antarctica.

In the past 11 years, he has snapped about 500 synagogues in approximately 50 countries, from the exotic like Rangoon, Burma, where men wore saris to the folksy such as Minot, N.D., which serves as a church on Sunday.

They range from grand cathedral-like structures, such as one in Alsace, to derelict ones in Poland, used as barns and warehouses.

Dana, a former Montrealer now living in tiny Williamstown, Ont., just over the border, has been able to travel extensively thanks mainly to his being a senior advisor to the World Assembly of Small & Medium Businesses, a United Nations affiliate. He's also a professor in McGill University's management faculty. He also spends a month a year teaching at the Academy of Economic Sciences in Bucharest, Romania.

His most recent trip was a couple of months in Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan and Kryrgyzstan in the former Soviet Union.

In his research on local businesses, Dana was struck how often Jews were or had been an integral part of so many countries' commerce. In Sofia, Bulgaria, the old synagogue is next to the marketplace.

"I am surprised how often when I talk to government officials and others about the economy the conversation shifts to religion," Dana said.

His search for remote synagogues inevitably leads him to the few Jews, usually elderly, who remain. In Panang, Malayasia, he met the last three Jews; their synagogue was by then a florist shop.

Across the Dakotas, he discovered about a dozen old synagogues in town where only a handful of Jews remain. He's photographed synagogues throughout the United States, including Alaska and Hawaii.

Similar search done in Canada

He made a similar search for abandoned synagogues in Canada, across the Prairies and Ontario. One surprise close to home is the West Laval synagogue, once popular when it was still cottage country, and now opened only on High Holy Days, yet well maintained.

Among the unusual functioning synagogues he's been in are on the Caribbean island of St. Thomas where the floor is covered with sand to remind worshippers of their ancestors time in the desert, and in Hobart, Tasmania, where Australia's penal colony past is reflected in the two-tiered seating: regular and less comfortable ones for the ex-convicts.

In a small-town Uzbekistan synagogue, magen David and crescent flags are side by side — a concession to living in a Muslim country, and vodka is imbibed liberally as part of the ritual, doubtless a Russian influence.

In Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, Dana was shocked that race keeps Jews apart. In 1994, there were two synagogues, one for the indigenous blacks and the other for white Jews from Islamic countries. "There was no interaction between the two," he said.

Elsewhere, in Africa, he photographed about 50 synagogues in Namibia, Kenya and Zimababwe.

At Beatties, Style is the Watchword

Beatties Men's and Boys Wear has been a part of Eglinton & Avenue Road since 1951 and has always featured one of the finest selections of men's & boys wear in the area. Bruce Hadden, the store's owner has been part of Beatties since 1952 and is responsible for the extensive variety in the store.

Beatties carries sizes 4 to 6X and 8 to 20X in boys' wear, plus a wide selection of "husky" sizes for the hard-to-fit boy; there is an equally wide range in mens' wear. For its large Back-to-School trade, Beatties carries a number of school uniforms for boys & girls, alongside a wide selection of boys' suits, sports coats, dress shirts, dress trousers and blazers for the High Holidays. There are sweaters, overcoats and zip-in lined trench coats, as well as accessories like ties, gloves, scarves and even some shoes.

Designer and brand names are still popular, and Beatties carries Tommy Hilfiger sweaters, sport shirts and cotton trousers. Club Monaco's fleece-lined clothing is another special favorite with kids. Other popular lines are Claiborne, Calvin Klein, Point Zero Enuff, and of course that old favorite, Levis. Jeans will never go out of style.

Because Beatties does alterations, they have their own tailors on the premises. This is one aspect of their emphasis on service and treating the customer as a long-term client. This philosophy reaps its reward in success and personal satisfaction; the overwhelming majority of Beatties' business is return business, and the rest is word-of-mouth referral.

Although there is more selection and less formality in clothing than there was for earlier generations, business is, in essence, the same, says Taylor. People want quality for their money, and service as well as product. In a world where change sometimes seems hard to keep up with, Beatties has made a point of knowing where the styles are going. Continuity speaks for itself at Beatties where five of the staff have been there for as long as 15 years.

Despite being much like the traditional combined clothier and tailor business, Beatties today serves a niche market: the man or boy who wants, not just something to wear nor even a designer label, but the personal touch.

A memorable start to Jewish education

Q? What dynamic and innovative result do you get when you put an Instructor of Early Childhood Education at Seneca (ECERT), a Senior Kindergarten teacher (HBA, B.Ed), a Pediatric Occupational Therapist (B.Sc. OT), a Resource Teacher (ECE an RT, BAISB), together in a room to discuss their ideas and dreams for Jewish Pre-school education?
A. SWEET BEGINNINGS!!! (as well as years of combined experience, diverse training ... and A LOT OF INITIALS!!!!!)

Putting all 10 fingers to work

Canada suffers from an "education gap". From Grade 4 on, pupils are urged to hand in neat, typed work; yet typing or keyboarding is usually not taught until high school or junior high, if at all. In fact, many schools' programs are so full they have no time to fit it in. Keyboarders was formed to fill this gap.

Most people learn to type with 2 fingers, by the notorious "hunt-and-peck" method. This method is slow and inaccurate; in business and on the Internet, it leads to less efficient time use and higher costs. In 12 sessions, Keyboarders will teach you to put all 10 fingers to work, to become a faster, more accurate typist.

Using state-of-the-art computers, Keyboarders' instructors teach both children and adults in an attractive setting; classes are small, and the instructors are patient. The curriculum combines instruction, drill, immediate feedback and timed tests. Students learn to type rhythmically, using all 10 fingers — a skill which, once you learn it, is yours for life.

More and more adults are using computers in business and personal life — and growing frustrated with the time and money consumed by "hunt-and-peck" typing. In response, Keyboarders offers adult typing and word processing classes in Microsoft Word 6.0 and WordPerfect 6.1.

Keyboarders is in Thornhill Square, 300 John St., #504 at Bayview. For more information and registration, call Mollie Gladstone at (905) 731-4744.

Activities include arts, crafts, music, Hebrew, French, Creative Movement as well as outdoor activities and nature study. To foster all-round growth, activities are matched to each child's abilities. (Cresthaven also toilet-trains children.)

Language and speech development ... through play

Does your child have difficulty understanding or communicating? Trouble with grammar, attention, reading or writing? If so, Speech-Language Pathologist Dr. Karen Halpern of Language Plus can help.

At Language Plus, Dr. Halpern focuses on two factors:

1) Children learn best when they enjoy an activity; that is, when playing. They work hard to overcome obstacles — without seeing their efforts as work. This insight is the basis of Dr. Halpern's "Language Thru Play" program. The "Speech" or "Peach" program uses this insight to correct speech mistakes, by comparing the mispronounced word with what the child meant to say.

2) At every stage of therapy, parents are involved. Parents know their child best, and spend the most time with them. Their presence allows for the learning to continue naturally in the home, without the need for specific homework assignments.

Dr. Halpern also offers "Imagination Plus" — a drop off program for children entering Nursery or Junior Kindergarten. This unique program is both fun and educational; stimulating a child's imagination and language skills in an interactive and creative setting. Themes such as opposites, guessing games and story creation are all achieved through puppetry , arts & crafts, songs and co-operative games. The program begins the week of September 23.

Dr. Karen Halpern is fluent in American Sign Language, competent in using PROMPT speech development, and has 10 years experience in language development for people with special needs. Her office is located at 272 Lawrence Avenue West, Suite 101. To learn more, make an appointment, or to register your child, call Dr. Halpern at (416) 789-1624.

Pollard ends hunger strike after meeting PM

By LEORA EREN FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM – Esther Pollard, the Canadian wife of convicted spy Jonathan Pollard, ended a 19-day hunger strike in Jerusalem last week, following a meeting with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and former chief rabbi Mordechai Eliyahu.

Only the day before, Esther Pollard had pledged to continue her strike until the United States releases her husband, who is serving a life sentence for passing secret information to Israel. But after the meeting with Netanyahu, the second in three days, Pollard ended the strike, saying she was convinced that the prime minister was deeply committed to fighting for her husband's release.

"I have never heard any Israeli prime minister make such strong promises in such unequivocal terms," she said. "Netanyahu has publicly committed himself to bring Jonathan home."

Last month, she accused Netanyahu of not bothering to raise her husband's case during his recent meeting with President Bill Clinton in Washington.

"There has been a dramatic change in the prime minister's attitude," said Pollard following her second talk with Netanyahu.

The meeting was arranged by Rabbi Eliyahu, who had just returned from visiting Pollard in the North Carolina prison where he is serving the 11th year of his sentence.

"The rabbi guaranteed the words of the prime minister," said Esther Pollard, an Orthodox woman who describes Eliyahu as the couple's chosen spiritual leader and religious authority. The rabbi also offered a prayer that Jonathan Pollard be free by Rosh Hashanah.

Esther Pollard embarked on the hunger strike in order to draw attention to the plight of her husband, following Clinton's recent refusal to grant him executive clemency. It was the third time that a U.S. president has refused to commute the sentence.

She said she decided to hold the hunger strike in Jerusalem rather than in Washington because she believes the key to her husband's release lies in Israeli, not American, hands.

"If Israel asked for his release in strong, clear terms, Jonathan could be free within 24 hours," said Pollard, who maintains that previous requests by Israeli prime ministers were not forceful enough. Jonathan Pollard was granted Israeli citizenship earlier this year.

She said the hunger strike, held outside a department store in the centre of Jerusalem, had been a last resort to help her husband, whose health and morale are rapidly deteriorating. "I don't know how much longer he can hold on."

During her strike, some 70,000 Israelis signed a petition calling on Netanyahu to take urgent action to get the U.S. administration to release Pollard, who has already served longer than any other American convicted of the same crime.

Esther Pollard, formerly Elaine Zeitz, of Montreal, said she expected her husband to be released shortly, following Netanyahu's promise and Rabbi Eliyahu's prayer. She said she had no immediate plans to return to her job as a special education teacher in Toronto.

"I'm staying right here and waiting for Jonathan."

Argentina to review cause of Israeli embassy bombing

By SERGIO KIERNAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES – The Argentine government has decided to order a new study of the March 1992 explosion at the Israeli Embassy here.

President Carlos Menem ordered the new study, to be conducted by international experts, after Israel harshly criticized the findings of an earlier study commissioned six months ago by the Argentine Supreme Court.

In announcing some of the findings of the first study, the court said last week that a three-member panel of experts had concluded the explosion was caused by explosives placed inside the embassy.

The findings contradicted earlier conclusions by Argentine, American, Israeli and European experts, who said that a car bomb was used in the attack.

The Israeli Foreign Ministry and Israel's ambassador to Argentina countered the report's conclusion, saying that they did not believe the bomb had been placed inside the building.

"We categorically reject the evaluations published by the Supreme Court in Argentina," the Foreign Ministry said last week in a statement.

The Israeli ambassador to Buenos Aires, Itzhak Aviran, was especially critical of last week's report.

"Argentine experts, police experts, Israeli experts, French experts and American experts all agree a car bomb was used," said Aviran.

"I cannot imagine how the Supreme Court can arrive at a different conclusion over four years after the explosion."

After asking Aviran "to tone down" his criticism, the Argentine government called the study "unofficial" and "just one more legal procedure in a complex case."

After a stormy Cabinet meeting on Aug. 15, Menem ordered a new study of the explosion "to settle the issue."

The embassy bombing killed 29 people and left more than 100 injured.

The Argentine government has come under constant attack from Jewish officials here and abroad for its inability to find those responsible for the embassy attack.

Tel Aviv subway construction begins

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Construction of a subway system to ease growing traffic congestion in the Tel Aviv area has begun.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Transport Minister Yitzhak Levy and Tel Aviv Mayor Ronni Milo were among the officials attending Sunday's ground-breaking ceremony.

"Unless we have something like this, Israelis will pay a high price in terms of time and traffic," Netanyahu said at the ceremony.

The project is in its initial stages, with four plans for subway lines in the greater Tel Aviv area still under consideration.

The subway is expected to cost some $2 to $3 billion and take close to 10 years to complete.

Milo said he believed the first line could be up and running in five years.Israel's only existing subway is the Carmelit, in Haifa, which has one line that connects the upper and lower parts of the city.

How to enter: A maximum of three photos per entrant may be submitted. Please write your name, address and phone number on the back of each photo. We can only return the photos if you provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

You may mail or deliver your photos to: CJN Rosh Hashanah Contest, The Canadian Jewish News, 10 Gateway Blvd., Suite 420, Don Mills, Ont., M3C 3A1.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, Aug. 26, 1996.

Prizes: The judges will choose three photographs which, in their opinion, are the most expressive and evocative.
The "winning" submissions will be published in The CJN Rosh Hashanah issue. In addition, each of the "winners" will receive a cirque for $100.

We will undoubtedly receive many worthy submissions. But only three will be selected as the "winners." We may also select other photographs for publication as honorable mentions. The decisions of the judges will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

How the winners will be notified: Winning entrants will be notified by telephone before Shabbat on Aug. 30, 1996.

When the prizes will be awarded: The winning photos will be published in The CJN of Sept. 12, 1996.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Regie des Loteries et courses du Quebec.

Bob Dole's positions are not consistent

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Bob Dole, crowned as the Republican party's presidential nominee at its convention in San Diego last week, is a flip-flop candidate with regard to his record on Middle Eastern issues.

Dole's hot-and-cold approach, which is governed by political expediency, is best exemplified by his attitude toward moving the U.S. Embassy in Israel from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem.

In 1990, when he was not running for president, Dole opposed a non-binding resolution in the Senate to transfer the embassy to Jerusalem. Dole, then Senate majority leader, argued that the status of Jerusalem was "better left to negotiations" between Israel and its Arab neighbors.

Dole went further. He demanded the repeal of a Senate resolution recognizing Jerusalem as Israel's capital. And he introduced an amendment to a foreign aid bill to block efforts by Israel to resettle Soviet immigrants in East Jerusalem, which he described as "occupied territory."

In May 1995, when he was a presidential hopeful, Dole performed an amazing volte-face. In a speech before the American Israel Public Affairs Committee in Washington, he disclosed that he and Senator Jon Kyl would jointly introduce the Jerusalem Embassy Relocation Implementation Act, which would empower the United States to begin construction of an embassy in Jerusalem in the following year.

Although Jewish Republicans and conservative Israeli politicians liked the bill, it received a less than warm reception from the American and Israeli governments. President Bill Clinton and then prime minister Yitzhak Rabin feared that the prospective legislation might prejudice Israel's final status talks with the Palestinians.

Chastened by the chilly reaction, Dole went back to the drawing boards and introduced a watered-down version of the bill. Passed by a 93-5 margin in the Senate, it calls on the government to move the U.S. Embassy to Jerusalem by May 1999, when final status talks are supposed to be completed. (Whether that timetable can be met is debatable now that Israel has a new prime minister who opposes the very idea of discussing Jerusalem's status with the Palestinians.)

Dole's has also modified his position on foreign aid.

In 1990, while on a trip to the Middle East, Dole, calling Israel a "spoiled child," proposed a five percent reduction in Israel's (and Egypt's) $3 billion (US) assistance package.

When his proposal came under fire from Jews and Republicans like Newt Gingrich (the present Speaker of the House of Representatives), Dole, who normally backed foreign aid bills, lashed back. He declared: "The leaders of the pro-Israel lobby are short-sighted and selfish in their zealous effort to protect Israel's aid level at any cost."

Later, in a newspaper article, Dole wrote: "Unfortunately, some people seem to think that if you disagree with a single policy or practice of the Israeli government ... you should be characterized as 'anti-Israel.' That is bunk."

Dole was an early opponent of a $10 billion loan guarantee package to Israel. The issue arose when George Bush, who was then president, threatened to withhold the funds unless Yitzhak Shamir, the Israeli prime minister, stopped building settlements in the territories.

Dole, who was not known as an admirer of the Likud government, eventually supported the loan guarantee.

Dole did not endear himself to Israel's friends on two other occasions. On the eve of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, he met with Saddam Hussein, the Iraqi president, in Baghdad. Dole, who had criticized Israel for its 1981 air raid on Iraq's nuclear reactor, reportedly told Bush upon his return to Washington that Saddam Hussein was "a leader to whom the United States can talk."

(Dole's favorable appraisal of the Iraqi strongman was not unusual. At that time, Iraq was widely seen as a bulwark against Iran, whose Islamic fundamentalist regime had antagonized and humiliated the United States.)

Dole, too, ruffled feathers when, in the late 1980s, he indirectly blamed Israel for the kidnapping and murder of William Higgins, a U.S. army officer serving with the United Nations peacekeeping force in Lebanon.

Lately, Dole has accentuated the positive, presumably in a bid to woo Jewish voters and fundraisers.

Shortly after he announced his candidacy, Dole urged the United States to negotiate "a full-fledged comprehensive alliance" with Israel. And in the wake of his meeting in New York City with Israel's newly-minted prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, Dole claimed that the United States' relationship with Israel "would be stronger under a Dole administration."

Yet, on the eve of Netanyahu's accession to power, Dole was quoted as saying that a Likud victory "would make it more difficult, at least from the outset," to pursue the peace process.

Will the real Bob Dole please stand up.

state, for all its citizens?" said Lior Horev, who submitted one of three petitions to keep the street open.

The battle over Bar Ilan heightened this year after the victories of religious political parties in the May 29 national elections.

The dispute was further fuelled by the decision in July in which Transportation Minister Yitzhak Levy, a member of the National Religious Party, said Bar Ilan would be closed to traffic during Sabbath and holiday prayer times for a four-month experimental period.

The High Court suspended Levy's order pending its own ruling.

Both sides of the dispute gave limited approval to the court's proposal to form a committee to study the issue. "Of course we welcome it, as long as the interests of all parties are represented on the committee," said Knesset member Yossi Sarid of the secularist Meretz party, who also submitted a petition against closing the road.

"Form a committee, please. But Bar Ilan must be closed. Every time a car goes by on the Sabbath, residents of the area are hurt," said Meir Shechter, a lawyer for the religious petitioners.

Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert said he would honor the ruling, but added that a proposal he made recently to build a tunnel underneath the road would be the optimal solution.

Last Saturday, the street was closed to traffic for close to an hour, but not because of the demonstrators. Police ordered the closure for the unexpected arrival of Public Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani, who irritated local police officials for not coordinating the visit ahead of time.

Kahalani said he made the visit to meet with members of the community in an effort to create tolerance among religious and secular Israelis alike. He visited a synagogue and promised to look into the concerns of the haredi community.

When he got into his car, some demonstrators asked him to wait a half hour until the Sabbath ended.

When the minister opted to drive off, demonstrators shouted, "Shabbos, Shabbos," as they do at other motorists driving on the Sabbath.

Netanyahu discusses plan for redeployment in Hebron

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has convened members of his cabinet to discuss plans for a redeployment of Israeli troops in the West Bank town of Hebron.

Under the terms of the Interim Agreement, Israel was to redeploy from about 80 percent of Hebron. But according to the plan presented last week by Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai, Israeli troops would remain in more districts of the often volatile town than was negotiated in the agreement.

"A greater presence serves Jewish and Arab interests," Netanyahu told Israel Radio earlier in the day.

He said any outbreak of violence in Hebron, the only West Bank town with Jewish settlers and Arabs living side by side, would "scuttle the entire peace process."

The plan calls for Israeli troops to continue patrolling Arab neighborhoods after the redeployment, depending on the security situation.

This was based on the principle of preserving the troops' right to "hot pursuit" of Palestinians suspected of committing security offenses.

Leaks from the report indicated that the redeployment would be carried out more slowly than was agreed upon by the previous Labor government and the Palestinian Authority.

The plan was still subject to government approval before it would be presented to the Palestinian side.

The long-delayed redeployment from Hebron has been looked upon as a test of Netanyahu's intentions to continue the peace process with the Palestinians.

Mordechai is scheduled to meet next week with Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat to discuss the redeployment.

committee for negotiations with the Palestinians.

The long-standing rivalry between Netanyahu and Levy resurfaced with a vengeance two weeks ago, following a series of what Levy considered slights to his position and that of his ministry.

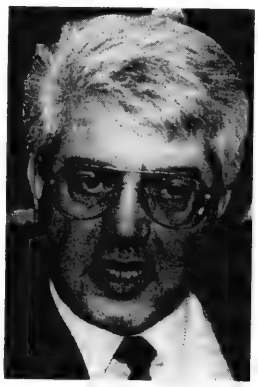
These included political contacts carried out by the prime minister's diplomatic adviser, Dore Gold, without Levy's knowledge, and the failure of the Prime Minister's Office to brief the Foreign Ministry about contacts made with foreign diplomats.

The final straw came when Netanyahu made his first official trip to Jordan this month as prime minister without being accompanied by Levy or any member of the Foreign Ministry staff.

Levy therefore boycotted cabinet meetings and sessions of a forum of senior ministers that dealt with security issues.

Levy returned to his office in Jerusalem on Sunday, after making what was described as a personal trip to New York.

Prior to his meeting with Netanyahu, Levy did not attend a meeting held earlier in the day, where members of the ministerial forum discussed a Defence Ministry proposal for an IDF redeployment in the West Bank town of Hebron.



David Levy

During those talks, the ministers disagreed on the details of the plan, which calls for Israeli troops to remain in more of the Arab districts of Hebron than originally agreed to in the Interim Agreement signed last September in Washington.

The plan also calls for greater numbers of Israeli troops to remain in Hebron than originally proposed.

During the meeting, Transport Minister Yitzhak Levy, of the National Religious Party, demanded that the plan also call for strengthening the Jewish population in Hebron, which currently numbers about 450.

Anti-Semitic propaganda posted on Dole Website

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

A U.S. white supremacist group is posting anti-Semitic propaganda on an Internet home page designed to look like the official Website of the Dole/Kemp presidential campaign.

Employing the artwork and general design of the official Bob Dole "online campaign," the National Alliance has added its own anti-immigrant, Jewish conspiracy material. As a result, an Internet surfer searching for material on the Dole campaign could stumble on the white supremacist material, believing it to be the official campaign position of presidential candidate Bob Dole.

There is only one official Website for the Dole campaign, said Andrew Weinstein, director of media relations for the campaign. Its Internet address is: [www.dole96.com.], he said.

However, someone surfing the Internet and using a search engine like Yahoo or Webcrawler to look for information on the campaign is faced with numerous alternate Websites, each with the name "Dole" in it. The National Alliance's Website is one of them.

The Website presents six "icons" — one of them a photo of vice-presidential candidate Jack Kemp — which give access to different material posted by the neo-Nazi group.

In addition to sporting the artwork of the official Dole Website, the National Alliance's Website claims: "Most text and images courtesy and copyright Dole for President Inc. Paid for by Dole for President."

It also gives the address for the Dole campaign headquarters in Washington, D.C., further suggesting it is an official Website.

But its material is strictly extremist. A lengthy essay alleges Jewish control over the mass media and entertainment industries and suggests "the alien grip on our news and entertainment media must be broken."

"Jewish media control" is an "evil power," the essay states.

"To permit the Jews, with their 3,000-year history of nation-wrecking, from ancient Egypt to Russia, to hold such power over us is tantamount to race suicide," the article continues.

Noting that the Internet — the international network of computers — is highly unregulated, Weinstein said the Dole campaign will examine the National Alliance's Website to determine whether there have been any infringements of its copyright.

The National Alliance is listed as a neo-Nazi hate group in the 1993 year end Intelligence Report by Klanwatch, a project of the Southern Poverty Law Centre. It is centred in Hillsboro, W.Va., Arlington Va., Stone Mountain, Ga., and New York City, among other locations.

PM signals flexibility on Lebanon first focus

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is no longer insisting that talks with Syria initially focus just on Lebanon, but signaled that he is willing to negotiate over the Golan and Lebanon simultaneously.

Meanwhile, there were growing indications last week that Israel intended to be more activist in staging attacks against Hezbollah north of the security zone in Lebanon. Sources say there have been five inner cabinet meetings dealing with the subject of potential retaliation in Lebanon and contingency plans are being drawn up.

While it remains unclear if Israel has plans to hit Syrian targets in the Bekaa Valley if needed, there is reason to believe that Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai chose his words carefully when he said last week that Israel would be willing to attack any element in Lebanon.

In a call-in questions and answers session on CNN last week, Netanyahu warned of sharp retaliation in the event that the Gallilee is hit with Katyushas.

While saying he had no confirmation that Hezbollah has rockets with an extended range, he declared in a grave voice, "Israel will not tolerate the shelling of the Gallilee, the rocketing of civilian settlement without a very, very stiff response. It is not something that I would suggest to anyone. It is not a good idea to test our will and resolve on this."

During the program, he expressed concern that if the violence in Lebanon is not solved, it will worsen. "Lebanon, in the last four or five years, has shown a continuous pattern of escalation, which is neither good for Syria nor for Israel nor for peace."

On the subject of diplomacy, Netanyahu voiced his preference for negotiating over Lebanon first, but then added he would be prepared to negotiate on a few issues at once.

"Lebanon is a good place – not to end negotiations with Syria – to start negotiations with Syria and to discuss other issues later or simultaneously," he said. "It is not a sequential process, either. I am prepared to discuss all outstanding issues on which we have differences."

Toronto student enjoys 'pioneering experience'

By JODY KASNER

What a year to be in Israel! There was the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, the terrorist bombings, Operation Grapes of Wrath and the elections.

Election time is always exciting and as I discovered, Israelis are passionate about their politics. Everyone has a sign on their house and/or a bumper sticker on their car. Cab drivers hand out stickers. Children stop traffic to hand out flyers. Can you imagine such a thing in Canada? I loved it.

But there was more to my year than bus bombs and politics.

I went to Israel to study at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. More specifically I was part of the one-year program at the Rothberg School for Overseas Students.

My decision to study in Israel for the year was officially made during my graduating year of high school. At the time, I was madly in love with Israel (of course I still am) and needed to find a way to spend a year there that would be acceptable to both me and my parents — Hebrew U.

Those who have chosen to study in the program are good students to start with. They are also interested in the specific topics of study offered, such as Hebrew, terrorism and Middle Eastern affairs.

I loved being in Jerusalem. I loved the idea of living in Jerusalem. On weekends, overseas and Israeli students alike would clear out of the dorms. Israeli students would go home to their families. Overseas students would visit relatives or go for jaunts around the country.

Some weekends I'd go away, but more often than not I preferred to stay in Jerusalem. For me there's nothing like Shabbat in Jerusalem.

Israel also served as a great travel base. October break was Eastern Europe, December was the Sinai, February break Jordan. And ironically, Egypt during Passover.

After school finished, I volunteered on Kibbutz Bar Am for five weeks. This kibbutz, half a kilometre from the Lebanese border, was truly the best place I could have chosen to spend the summer. In the green hills of the north, the air was fresh and the night sky full of stars.

Aside from the helicopters flying overhead, the occasional Katyusha in the fields or the sporadic gunfire, it truly was the most peaceful, safest-feeling place I've been.

Kibbutz life, for me, was everything I had been looking for in Israel. Working the fields, planting trees and picking fruit I finally got the great pioneering experience I had dreamt of for so long.

I would often stop and ponder about how hard the founders of the kibbutz must have worked to establish this place. It's so beautiful and perfect now.

How hard thousands of immigrants worked to build a country. It may not be perfect, but it sure is beautiful.

Jody Kasner is a student at York University.

A lifetime of memories from one year in Israel

By HEATH APPLEBAUM

For the past 12 months, I've had the privilege of living, working and studying International politics in Israel at the University of Tel Aviv.

It was a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to study the Arab/Israeli conflict and various other related subjects and to be part of Israeli history as it unfolded, rather than reading about it in textbooks and watching it in CNN soundbites.

Living in Israel's modern heartland, I had a chance to meet the people behind the headlines, attend lectures given by Israeli political figures and watch as peace negotiations help to shape the new Middle East.

I experienced firsthand what life in Gaza is really like, speaking with local Palestinians as they prepared to vote in their first-ever elections. I travelled to neighboring Egypt and spoke with Egyptians about Israel and the prospects for regional peace. I attended peace rallies, participated in the Israeli national elections and shook hands with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Unfortunately, along with all Israelis and overseas students, I also shared in the pain and tragedy of Yitzhak Rabin's assassination. And I spoke with victims of terrorist bus-bombings, teenage soldiers, UN peacekeepers and grandparents who had fought in Israel's War of Independence. I witnessed Christmas festivities in Bethlehem and took part in Passover services in Jerusalem during its 3,000-year celebrations.

Unique work opportunity

I was also fortunate to find unique work opportunities that had me teaching ice hockey in the Middle East's only Olympic hockey rink and bartending at a five-star hotel for some of Israel's most famous celebrities. Of course, none of this would have been possible unless I had taken the initiative to continue my studies abroad.

Every year, hundreds of intellectually curious Canadian students live and study in Israel, pursuing their degrees in a wide range of disciplines — and we learn Hebrew too.

The overseas student program was a chance to study, develop new friendships, travel, experience history as it unfolded, explore ancient landscapes, meet unique people, discover a lot about myself and my heritage. Study abroad also taught me to appreciate many of the things in Canada that I've always taken for granted. I know that these memories will remain with me for the rest of my life.

Cutbacks mean shorter hospital stays for new moms

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — By early November, mothers and their new babies will spend only one night in North York General Hospital if their deliveries are normal.

The 24-hour stay for obstetric patients in a hospital that serves a significant part of the Jewish community is only one of the cutbacks resulting from a $4.5-million slash in Ontario government funding to the hospital this year.

Other steps include a five per cent reduction in elective surgery, such as gall bladder and cataract removals, and a cut in a wide range of ambulatory (outpatient) services.

"It's unfortunate, but we have no choice," said hospital president and CEO Murray MacKenzie.

Many obstetric patients already choose to leave the hospital after one night, MacKenzie said, and some even go home straight from the delivery room.

The average length of stay in the maternity ward last year was 2.6 days, including abnormal cases.

The one-night stay for mothers will be phased in during September and October, when about 25 will go home with their babies every week, to be followed by nurses visiting their homes.

Women's College Hospital is the only other Metro hospital with the 24-hour policy, MacKenzie said, but most hospitals in the United States observe it.

With follow-up safeguards in place for these mothers, the CEO does not feel it represents any danger to them. At any rate, no protests have come from women's groups about the new policy.

North York General Hospital has 4,000 deliveries a year, second only to Mt. Sinai in Metro.

Waiting lists for elective operations including orthopedic procedures (hip replacements) will lengthen because of the five percent cut to take effect in the current 96-97 fiscal year. For example, cataract patients may have to wait seven or eight months instead of five or six months.

"We're worried about the future and what the decisions of the province's hospital restructuring commission will be," MacKenzie said.

(A recommendation that North York Branson Hospital be closed and turned into an ambulatory service is now before the commission.)

North York General treats more emergency patients than any other hospital in Canada because it is so accessible to major highways.

A big payoff

TORONTO – The Toronto New Leadership Division of The Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation has fulfilled its $100,000 three year pledge for the Neonatal Intensive Care Unit at Shaare Zedek Medical Centre in Jerusalem, in two years.

In presenting a symbolic oversized cheque to Bernie Abrams (right), the Foundation's national president, Dov Altman (left), chair of the division, expressed his appreciation for all the effort extended by the members. He explained that the goal was reached so quickly thanks to the overwhelming success of their annual Shaare Zedek Hos-pital/Solursh Felman & Partners Golf tournaments and other events.

Cooling of the scalp key to preventing hair loss

By GAIL LICHTMAN
WZPS

JERUSALEM — One of the most stressful side effects of chemotherapy treatment for cancer, especially among women, is hair loss. Now, an Israeli company has invented a device which can significantly reduce hair loss resulting from treatment.

The device, called the Scalp Cooling System II (SCS II), is the brainchild of Freddy Pachys, managing director of Amit Technology Science and Medicine Ltd., a 12-year-old Jerusalem-based company specializing in marketing and developing medical equipment.

The result of five years of research and development, SCS II works on the surprisingly simple principle of cooling the scalp to between eight and 10 C. This causes constriction of the blood vessels along the scalp and reduces metabolic activity. These two effects reduce blood flow to the hair follicles, lessening the amount of chemotherapic material carried there. The result is prevention or significant reduction of hair loss.

"We only cool the surface of the scalp," says Pachys, who is an electrical engineer. "We do not touch the rest of the body at all. SCS II does not alter body or brain temperature in any way. The idea of using cooling to prevent hair loss has been around for many years, but treatment consisted of putting a cap in a deep freezer and then having the patient wear it on his or her head. The cooling effect was only for a very short period of time."

Designed for hospital use, the SCS II consists of a computerized main cooling unit with two caps attached to the unit via hoses — rather like a bouffant hair dryer from the 1960s. The caps, made of lightweight, colorful cloth, weigh less than standard motorcycle helmets.

Patients are seated in a comfortable chair next to the unit. They put the cap on about 30 minutes before starting chemotherapy treatment, keep it on during treatment and for about an hour afterwards. While wearing the cap, patients can listen to music or read. "We are even considering adding a walkman to our units," said Pachys.

The SCS II has recently completed 18 months of clinical trials at Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem, Rambam Hospital in Haifa and Ichilov Hospital in Tel Aviv. In these tests, 80 percent of cancer patients using the device reported little or no hair loss. Hadassah Hospital has since purchased the system for use in patients suffering from auto-immune diseases such as lupus and overactive immunization systems. The SCS II can be used for most types of cancer treatment with the exception of melanoma and leukemia.

"The most important thing," says Pachys, "is that we are helping patients from a psychological point of view and this, of course, aids in the clinical treatment. Being bald is depressing and lowers a person's self-image. It also advertises the fact that he or she is undergoing treatment for cancer."

Cancer treatment

Shoshana (not her real name) is undergoing chemotherapy for breast cancer at Hadassah Hospital and is using the Scalp Cooling System. "There has been a slight loss of hair but no one else has noticed," she says. "I don't know how I would have reacted if my hair had fallen out. The side effects of the chemotherapy are very unpleasant as it is. Going bald would have been the last straw."

The SCS II, which is manufactured by Tana Industries Ltd. of Kibbutz Halemed Hey, has been certified by the Israeli Ministry of Health and approved by the Israeli Standards Institute. It has been sold to several Israeli hospitals and the company is now in the process of setting up worldwide marketing.

Pachys, who has applied for a worldwide patent for the device, says that SCS II is about to be installed in hospitals in Mexico and Columbia and that the company is working on sales to South Africa, Holland, Spain and Portugal. In the United States, he is in the process of registering with the FDA.

Script writer brings Stern memoir to the big screen

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – In the study of his Forest Hill home, Len Blum hands the visitor a paperback copy of Howard Stern's scatalogical memoir Private Parts, whose cover promises, "Soon To Be A Major Motion Picture."

Then Blum – the 45-year-old, award-winning screenwriter who commutes regularly between Toronto and New York – admits that he's been working for the past 17 months on bringing Private Parts to the big screen. Currently filming in New York, the Paramount production is due in theatres next February.

"I was very skeptical at first about taking on this project, because I didn't get Howard Stern. I thought he was obnoxious," Blum admits. But after film producer Ivan Reitman invited him to visit Stern and sit in on his radio show over two days in New York, Blum's opinion of the controversial X-rated radio personality became, well, less stern.

"On the flight home, I asked myself, 'Should I do this?' And I realized I had laughed harder in the last two days than I had in the past 20 years."

But Blum also recognized that Reitman, a Canadian-born Hollywood producer with a Midas touch, had rarely, if ever, steered him wrong. It was Reitman who had encouraged Blum and his friend Dan Goldberg to write the comedy script about summer camp that later became the smash hit Meatballs.

For 15 years until then, Blum had been, he says, a "mediocre rock'n' roll musician with no particular success."

He shows the visitor the Genie he won for Meatballs in1980, along with a row of framed posters of other films he's scripted or co-scripted since then. They include

Len Blum

Stripes, Feds and Beethoven's 2nd, all produced by Reitman.

"After years of my relations asking me when I planned to get a real job and looking at me as though I was a bum, suddenly those same relatives were looking at me as if I was a genius because I'd written a hit movie," Blum says.

"To become a successful writer in an area I hadn't even chosen was quite a shock for me. But I now realize that I'm much better at being a screenwriter than at being a musician."

Admitting to a facility for gags, Blum says his art also involves an ability to relate to deeper themes such as family unity and the triumph of the disadvantaged.

"I'm more likely to do good work when I'm working with themes that I have some deeper connection with," he says. "I have to find ways to connect myself personally with my characters. It's not casual or technical with me, since everything I write changes me quite a bit."

The values he brings to the screen include Jewish values and a natural affinity for the underdog, Blum says. His father, the late Sidney Blum, worked as a human rights activist, and his mother, Mary Blum-Devor, is a psychologist and ardent Zionist who divides her time equally between Canada and Israel.

Blum says it makes sense that he should have found success in writing rather than music, since there have been "generations of scholars and writers" in his family, a tradition that persists to the present day. His brother, Reuven Blum, is a chassidic rabbi in Jerusalem. His wife, Heather Munroe-Blum, is president of Research and International Relations for the University of Toronto.

Even when it isn't apparent on the screen, Blum says he is always crafting his films as a Jew, and that to do otherwise would be impossible.

"My father enlisted in the U.S. army to fight Hitler at the age of 17 and came out at the end of World War II missing a foot and with a Purple Heart. He devoted the rest of his life to being a human rights organizer.

"As I work, I'm conscious on a daily basis of what he would think of my work. He enlisted to fight Hitler as a Jew; in the same way, I write as a Jew."

Blum's 11-year-old daughter Sydney adored Beethoven's 2nd, but her father seems unsure whether she'll be ready to see his current project when it reaches the big screen.

"She'll be 11½ when the Howard Stern movie opens," he says, looking dubious. "I don't know. I'll have to see how mature she is at that point."

Confiscated art to be sold

NEW YORK – Approximately 1,000 works of art, most of which were confiscated from Jewish homes by the Nazis and hidden for over 50 years, will be auctioned in Vienna on Oct. 29 and 30.

The proceeds from the Mauerbach Benefit Sale, conducted on a non-profit basis by Christie's, will benefit Jewish and non-Jewish victims of the Holocaust and their families.

The sale is expected to raise $3.5 million (US).

A distinguished international honorary committee has been established by The Federation of Austrian Jewish Communities to lend its support to the sale.

Edgar M. Bronfman, chairman of the Seagram Company and president of World Jewish Congress (WJC), and Ronald S. Lauder, chairman of Estée Lauder International will co-chair the event.

"I am proud to be part of this significant undertaking," said Lauder, who is treasurer of the WJC. "Not only does it benefit Holocaust victims, but it also offers all of us who care so deeply a significant commemorative opportunity."

Bronfman echoed Lauder's statement, adding, "The sale will serve as an example for the many outstanding restitution issues which, after more than 50 years, still need to be resolved."

The sale will take place at the MAK-Austrian Museum of Applied Arts in Vienna. Property will be on view from Oct. 22.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

Holocaust Art & Film

A new course at York University examines the way visual art and film about the Holocaust are used to shape collective memory.

According to professors Shelley Hornstein and Florence Jacobowitz, Auschwitz and World War II force a rethinking of esthetics and the language of representation. Their course – Culture, Memory & Resistance: Responses to the Holocaust in Visual Art and Film – looks at how art referring to these events explores the question of representation.

"The course will demonstrate the power and timeliness of artistic forms of resistance and commemoration by looking at a specific historical moment and its impact on our present concepts of truth," says a course brochure.

The course runs Monday evenings from 7 to 10, from Sept. 9 at the Dept. of Fine Arts, York U. Atkinson College. For more information, call 416-736-5227 or contact [http://www.atkinson.yorku.ca] on the Internet.

Netanyahu Calls For Cooler Heads

JERUSALEM – Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu urged Israelis last week to stop selling long-term savings plans and provident funds and to "consider things coolly."

Soon after, the Bank of Israel announced that it would buy millions of dollars of bonds to help banks raise cash and meet growing public demands to cash in savings plans.

The prime minister also issued a government guarantee to provide a safety net for state bonds.

The government is committed "to take whatever necessary means to ensure that the bonds always enjoy support," the prime minister told Israel Radio.

The bank said in a statement Thursday that it would buy about $180 million (Cdn.) in government bonds.

Netanyahu's remarks came after the recent record number of sell orders, which totaled about $365 million.

Two weeks ago, the bond market registered record-high sale orders reflecting withdrawals of nearly NIS 3 billion ($1.32 billion) requested from the provident funds for September.

Traders said most of the sell orders were made at a price limit, indicating that while provident-fund managers are interested in disposing of bonds, they do not intend to do so at any price.

Egypt Denies Intention To Cancel Cairo Summit

JERUSALEM – There is no intention of cancelling the Cairo economic summit scheduled for November, according to the head of Egypt's regional economic negotiation team, Raouf Saad.

Saad, Egypt's deputy assistant foreign minister, met last week in Cairo with senior economic representatives from Jordan, the Palestinian Authority (PA) and Israel.

It was the highest level economic meeting between the three countries and the PA, which comprise the Regional Economic Development Working Group (REDWEG), since Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's election.

"There has been no statement from Cairo that we won't hold the conference," Saad said.

Dolphins Make Big Splash In Eilat

According to a news report, three dolphins saved a diver from sharks last month off Sharm al Sheikh near the southern tip of the Sinai peninsula.

While shark attacks are extremely rare in Red Sea waters, stories about dolphins who come to the aid of stranded sailors or distressed swimmers have become part of the region's seafaring lore.

For Dafna Neuhaus, an official of Dolphin Reef Eilat, such extraordinary tales are more than big fish stories. As one of numerous employees who deal with dolphins daily, Neuhaus is aware of their high intelligence, their remarkable empathy and friendly rapport with humans, even of their astonishing therapeutic and healing powers.

Since Eilat's highly popular dolphin compound opened six years ago, its stars have been five bottlenose dolphins purchased from a Russian laboratory on the Black Sea, as well as four babies born since the quintet arrived. Although the playful aquatic mammals weren't used to these waters, they have apparently fared well. According to Neuhaus, they vastly prefer their manmade safe haven over the unprotected open waters of the gulf into which they sometimes venture.

"Our dolphins have access to the open sea," she explains. "Every morning we open the gate and if they want to go out, they go out. The gate is reopened for the last training session at 4 o'clock, and the dolphins that go out in the morning always return for the night."

The dolphins hunt and give birth exactly as in nature, and "don't do anything they don't want to do," says Neuhaus. While groups of visitors pay to go snorkelling and diving with them, the dolphins participate only by free will, without the reinforcement of a feeding. Visitors are shown how to touch them and otherwise to treat them with respect, so as to strengthen their bond with humans.

Fed during daily training sessions – to the audible delight of both spectators and squealing dolphins – the feisty animals still maintain their natural hunting instincts, since the nets enclosing their 10,000-sq.-metre Red Sea compound are wide enough to allow fish to penetrate.

"Other dolphins have come from other areas and these dolphins have chased them away," says Neuhaus. "They want to keep their territory."

Since it has been shown that severely abused children or children with Down's syndrome and other handicaps can make remarkable advances after interacting with dolphins, a therapy program here attracts children from around the world.

Each of the 20 children who are in treatment at any given time works privately with only one trainer.

"The dolphins actually sense that something is wrong," says Neuhaus. "The moment the kid is in the water, they are all around him, and all he has to do is lie on his back. Soon he begins to trust the dolphins -- and later, people as well.

"With some of them, you can see some nice progress," she continues. "We had a kid who had been so abused that he stopped moving – he didn't talk to anyone, he didn't look at anyone and he didn't do anything. Slowly, slowly now, he laughs and looks people in the eye."

Admission to Dolphin Reef Eilat, which includes observation of the dolphins during training sessions, is $8.50 (US). A 25-minute snorkelling encounter with the dolphins is $48 for adults and a 30-minute introductory dive with the dolphins is $58. A six-day diving program, with two dives daily, is $159.

Located three kilometres south of Eilat along the road to the Egyptian border, Dolphin Reef Eilat also features a private beach, photography centre, dive centre, nature films, snack bar and pub on the beach. Telephone: 07- 371846.

Yiddish rookie gives stellar show

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two years ago mezzo-soprano Stella Walker didn't know a word of Yiddish. But she has worked hard and recently, she sang a solo world premiere of Srul Irving Glick's Time Cycle, based on poetry by the late Peretz Miransky, at a Beth Tikvah Synagogue concert attended by 225.

In fact, the prairie-born and Vancouver-trained Walker has given five recitals of Yiddish folk and art music in Toronto, with help from language coach Ethel Raicus. Her interest in Yiddish was stirred by her recent discovery that her maternal grandmother, born in Czechoslovakia, was Jewish, though she did not know that while growing up.

Stella Walker

Walker's mother, Lillie, one of 15 children, who lives in Moose Jaw, Sask., is one of her biggest fans, attending most of her Toronto concerts, travelling free as an ex-airline employee.

The singer's performance of Time Cycle was effective, but understated, in keeping with the ebb and flow of Miransky's poetry and with Glick's score, which matched the ethereal theme.

On the piano, Brahm Goldhammer was able to illuminate the score so well that it was more than an accompaniment. The portraits of dawn, day (sun and sea), sunset and night echoed in both the poetry and music.

The evening was graced by the attendance not only of Glick, but also of Helen Greenberg of Toronto and Beyle Schaechter-Gottesman, of New York, two other well known composers whose works Walker performed.

Maccabi coach wants to revive team's glory days

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the good old days, the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) used to field a pretty good squad of AA-level volleyball players.

For many years in the mid-'70s, the team would finish between seventh and 15th in cross-Canada competitions and do even better at the provincial level, often making it to the top three, recalls a former member of the team, George Shermer.

The team formed the nucleus of Maccabiah Games entries and though they never won a medal, they were competitive in a very high calibre event.

It pains Shermer to see how volleyball has fallen on hard times in the Jewish community — Canada hasn't sent a team to the Maccabiah Games in Israel since 1977. Shermer is hoping to change all that, beginning with Toronto's entry in the JCC Maccabi Youth Games which ran Aug. 18 to 22 in West Orange, N.J.

Shermer is Maccabi Ontario's volleyball chair and coach of the girls team at the Youth Games. He's been given the task of laying the groundwork for a Canadian team at upcoming Maccabiahs in Israel.

He believes the positive exposure given volleyball at the Atlanta Olympics and the newfound cachet for the beach variety of the sport will help entice young athletes to take it up.

He began to see a growing interest in the sport among teenagers even before the Olympics.

In April, 40 girls tried out for the Youth Games team. Nine were chosen. They are among 90 Toronto athletes in "Joisey" for the JCC/Maccabi competition.

Toronto also fielded teams in girls and boys basketball, boys baseball, boys and girls track and field, boys and girls swimming, boys and girls tennis, boys soccer and boys golf.

A boys volleyball team, which Shermer believes would have been competitive, was cut because of limited space. Toronto was allocated only so many places in Jersey and he had to choose between the boys and girls teams, Shermer explained.

George Shermer

"I felt the girls looked more committed. They had more of a desire to play together and do well," he said.

The girls volleyball team is stocked with players from various north Toronto public schools, as well as two youngsters from CHAT (the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto). The Jewish school has a very strong girls volleyball program thanks to the volunteer efforts of teachers who are interested in promoting the sport, he said.

The Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC), one of the "heirs" of the old JCC, has also made efforts to promote volleyball in the hopes of developing a nucleus of players to represent Canada at the Maccabiah Games in Israel. "I think we're one Games away," Shermer said.

The BJC has a boys juvenile team (17 and under) that's one of the top squads in Ontario, playing under the auspices of the Ontario Volleyball Association, Shermer said.

In September, the BJC will field a girls juvenile team (drawn in large part from the Maccabi team) and they'll compete as a rep team.

Shermer, who runs the sporting goods store at the BJC, is also expecting to launch boys and girls midget teams (for 14- and 15-year olds). All teams play as "The Blues."

Shermer believes that 13 or so is the ideal age for kids to begin taking the sport seriously. That's when youngsters get strong enough in their hands to pass the ball, he said.

A native of Bratislava, Czechoslovakia, Shermer came to Canada in 1968 after the Soviet crackdown on the "Prague Spring."

A competitive player in Bratislava, the 6-foot-4 spiker joined the Balmy Beach Canoe Club on moving to Toronto and played for two years there. He was recruited to play at the JCC in the mid '70s.

Shermer's wife, Anne, also teaches volleyball and was a top player for Settlement House in her heyday in the early '70s. Their two sons, Elie and Daniel, are competitive players as well.

The JCC Maccabi Youth Games attract young Jewish athletes from around the world but particularly from North America. More than 50 communities, including the host MetroWest, were represented at the games.

With 394 athletes, MetroWest fielded the largest contingent, while Los Angeles sent 192. Vancouver was expected to send a single track and field athlete.

Delegations were expected from Australia, Britain and Ramat Eliahu, MetroWest's twinned community in Rishon Lezion, Israel.

Soccer, basketball and volleyball were among the traditional team sports on tap, but the games also saw the debut of in-line hockey competition, with 10 teams participating.

A pyrotechnic display, live music, dancing and the lighting of the Maccabi torch were highlights of the opening ceremonies.

The ceremonies were held at the Continental Airlines Arena in East Rutherford, N.J., and included a memorial to the 11 Israelis killed by terrorists at the 1972 Munich Olympics.

Israel's slain Prime Minister, Yitzhak Rabin, was also honored.

Hockey tryouts to begin

TORONTO — Skaters and puckstoppers interested in wearing Canada's colors at next summer's Maccabiah Games in Israel will get a chance to show their wares in mid-September.

That's when Maccabi Canada's hockey tryouts will be held in Toronto. For three hours on Sept. 10 (beginning at 9 p.m.) and another three hours on Sept. 11 (beginning at 8 p.m.), Jewish skaters will be put through their paces by Gideon Lee, Maccabi's chair of hockey for Ontario and the West.

Tryouts will be held at Centennial Arena in North York.

The preliminary tryouts are designed to begin the process of establishing a core of players who will lead the team at the Maccabiah Games, which run from July 14 to 24, 1997. Competition will be held in the recently-renovated Olympic-sized rink in Metulla, in Israel's north.

The 15th Games marks the debut of hockey at the Maccabiah with four countries expected to compete — Canada, the United States, Israel and Russia. Canada will be coached by former Montreal Canadiens coach Jacques Demers.

Howard Waisglass, who is assisting Lee in assembling the Ontario and Western segment of the team, said they've already received several dozen applications. Many are from U.S. college players and those who skated at the junior A tier II level.

The September tryouts are the "opening casting call" for the team and Waisglass said they are open to all players. Though he doesn't want to discourage applicants, they should realize "it's pretty competitive hockey," he said.

Those interested are asked to contact Lee and Waisglass, preferably by fax, at: 416-223-4041. Lee can be reached by telephone at 416-512-6660 or 416-259-6655.

About jobs

Dear Lisa,

There is an internal position being advertised at our company. I know I'm qualified to do the job but can I apply?

Dear Reader,

The reason the job is being posted internally is to invite current company employees to apply. This method of recruiting can save a company considerable time and money.

To apply for the job, send in an application as the position description demands. If the application is going to the human resource person and you know who will supervise this position, you can copy the application to her. Don't tell anyone else you are applying for the job because you don't know who can talk behind your back or what they are saying. In addition, if your boss knows you are applying for another position, you may jeopardize the job you currently hold.

In the interview, being professional is very important. Answer each question posed to you as thought the interviewer does not know you. Recognize that though the interviewer has seen you in action, he needs to know how you would "fit" in this new job. An interviewer who knows you will be scrutinizing your every word and action to see how much you know about the position, the department and the company. He will likely also be aware of how you interact with other people in the organization.

Be prepared with a list of three references from outside the organization, if you can, to add to one within the organization. Ensure the phone numbers are current and each individual is willing to be contacted. The list you give your interviewer will look best if it is produced on a word processor or typewriter, as opposed to being handwritten.

After the interview is over, send a thank you note. Using e-mail is okay but a card sent in the mail is more professional and looks like you are not using your internal candidacy status to give you an advantage.

You will likely see your interviewer in the hall several times before you actually hear about your application status. At all these meetings, try not to lead the conversation toward a discussion of the new posting. Instead, talk about anything you might normally talk about with this person.

If you are offered the job, ask the human resources officer about company policy with respect to leaving your current job, advising other employees, and protecting your health coverage and pension. Follow his advice.

If you are not offered the job, try to meet with the interviewer to see why he turned you down. Listen to the points and offer explanations, if appropriate. Remember to stay professional and thank him for considering you and for the time he took to sit down with you. A written note isn't necessary.

PM may meet with Arafat

By LEORA EREN FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is expected to meet with Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat before Rosh Hashanah.

With Netanyahu scheduled to travel to the United States next month, there was speculation here that a meeting between the Israeli leader and Arafat might be a gesture for the White House indicating Netanyahu's intentions to continue the peace process.

Speculation about the possible meeting between Netanyahu and Arafat followed an announcement by President Ezer Weizman that he will meet with Arafat shortly, in what will be the Palestinian leader's first official visit to Israel since the new government assumed power.

The announcement, intended to revive the stalled peace talks, was seen as an embarrassment to Netanyahu, who has until now refused to meet with Arafat.

Nemsila case back on track

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A decision by a Federal Court judge in a Toronto war crimes case appears to have opened the door to the resumption of legal proceedings in a parallel case in Hope, B.C.

Last week, Federal Court judge James Jerome ruled that Josef Nemsila, 83, cannot rely on his domicile in Canada to prevent deportation proceedings against him.

The Nemsila judgment will likely mean the case of Antanas Kenstavicius will move ahead and could be heard as early as September, said Paul Vickery, director and general counsel of the Justice Department's war crimes unit. Another war crime suspect could be named within 30 days, he added.

Vickery said both the Nemsila and Kenstavicius cases involve alleged Nazi war criminals who never obtained Canadian citizenship. Government authorities are seeking to deport them for lying about their wartime activities when they immigrated to Canada.

The Kenstavicius case was held up pending a resolution of the legal issues in the Nemsila case.

Nemsila's lawyer, Barbara Jackman, convinced an Immigration adjudicator that by obtaining Canadian domicile, Nemsila was immune from deportation even though he lied to enter Canada.

'Matzahgate' report released

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Almost five months after talks began, the Office de la langue française (OLF) and Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) have finally dotted all the Is and crossed the Ts on an accord to keep the "matzahgate" affair from ever happening again.

The news was revealed at a press conference on Monday.

"We're glad to see it resolved," said CJC-Q chair Reisa Teitelbaum. "They're giving us something we always knew we were entitled to."

B'nai Brith (BB), however, said it was extremely concerned over the fact that CJC-Q and other Jewish organizations have agreed to "act as language inspectors" for the OLF, by promising to exert their "moral authority" on retailers in terms of how long Passover goods can stay on store shelves .

In the one-page document, the OLF officially recognizes the Jewish community's ongoing right to have imported Passover goods exempt from French-language labelling requirements.

It's a right the community already thought it had under Article 3.5, Section 5.1 of the French Language Charter's French-labelling

Homes Demolished

JERUSALEM – Interior Ministry demolition crews tore down two homes built without permits in the Ras Al-Amud neighborhood in eastern Jerusalem last week, as police stood guard to prevent disturbances by local residents.

The demolitions followed a similar action a week earlier by the city, which tore down two illegally built structures in the eastern Jerusalem neighborhood of Issawiya.

Rising Tensions

JERUSALEM – Weeks after Syria and Lebanon rejected a proposal from Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu for withdrawing Israeli troops from southern Lebanon, increasingly ominous warnings are emanating from Jerusalem and Syria.

The increase in saber-rattling on both sides has led several observers here, including the head of one of Israel's leading think tanks, to question whether an Israeli-Syrian military clash can be far off.

Foreign Help

JERUSALEM – Israel has sent messages to Syria via the United States, Russia and Egypt in an effort to ease increased tensions between the two countries.

Foreign Minister David Levy met last Wednesday with U.S. Ambassador Martin Indyk and asked him to inform Damascus that Israel wants to restart the long-stalled Israeli-Syrian negotiations.

Friendly Fire

JERUSALEM – An Israeli soldier was killed and another seriously injured in southern Lebanon last week when they were mistakenly fired on by another group of Israel Defense Force soldiers.

The soldiers, belonging to the Givati brigade, were returning from patrol in the western sector of the security zone.

JERUSALEM – The victims of a Jerusalem bus bombing were remembered last week at the site of the attack in Jerusalem's northern neighborhood of Ramat Eshkol.

Four people, excluding the suicide bomber, were killed in the Aug. 21, 1995, attack on Jerusalem's No. 26 bus.

Galilee Reunion

JERUSALEM – The architects of the Palestinian self-rule accords convened recently along the shores of the Sea of Galilee to mark three years since the first agreement was secretly initialed in Oslo.

CAN'T WAIT FOR PEACE, DAYAN SAYS

Defense Minister Moshe Dayan has declared that Israel must regard herself as the "permanent" regime in the occupied Arab territories, and must carry out necessary projects there without waiting for the day of peace since it may be "very late in coming."

Israel, Dayan said, must concentrate on her own activities "unilaterally" without relying on Arab cooperation. That, he explained, was the only realistic course in the absence of peace.

LUKEWARM WELCOME TO NEW RELIGION COURSE

The announcement that a course in world religions will be offered to Grade 11 and 12 students in Ontario secondary schools in 1972 has received a mixed reaction. The Canadian Jewish Congress, which has fought against the teaching of religion in Ontario's schools, said the new course was only a small step in the right direction.

"The government is doing too little," the CJC said. "It is very difficult to determine whether through these steps the government is moving forwards or backwards...in dodging its essential responsibility to abolish religious education in public schools."

Network Canada ceases operations

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Network Canada, the Canadian arm of World Union of Jewish Students, has ceased to operate due to withdrawal of funding by the Council of Jewish Federations Canada (CJF).

Technically, Network has not "died" (it has not been dissolved legally), but has merely been abandoned. Diminishing membership was one reason given by CJF assistant director Jeremy Cohen for the funding cut.

In May, in response to the imminent Network shutdown, student leaders from across the country held an emergency Network conference near Montreal.

Out of that meeting was born an independent Ontario Jewish student council, as well as regional counterparts (which are still being set up) for western Canada and Quebec. The Atlantic region has a pre-existing system run by a community professional.

The Ontario council, which is student-run, held its first meeting recently at the Lipa Green building, where members representing 10 provincial campuses clarified their mandate for themselves and "establishment" observers including Jennifer Turack, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region's director of community services and youth activities; and Lance Davis, program director of the University of Toronto's Jewish student organization.

Members of the new council voted to name it Kol Hastudentim Ontario/Ontario Jewish Student Voice. It is not a reborn Network, they stressed.

The focus of Kol Hastudentim is "definitely different," said Jason Young, coordinator of the new entity and immediate past president of the JSU at the University of Western Ontario. (He is now a student at the University of Toronto, where he is working on a master's degree.)

Although Network's political activist agenda has been abandoned, Kol Hastudentim will carry on Network's commitment to being student-run. It will also focus on developing student leadership, strengthening the individual campus groups and serving as a link between Ontario campuses.

Early plans include the creation of a "program bank" of Jewishly oriented programming ideas and how to implement them, as well as shared regional programming.

Young projects a yearly budget of $11,250, $1,000 of which is allocated for administration expenses.

Network, in contrast, had an annual budget last year of $67,000. Prior to last year, its annual budget was $100,000; the $40,000 was redirected to local communities for student travel to conferences.

Kol Hastudentim is seeking funding geared to projects such as

Back to school

In just over two weeks, Rosh Hashanah arrives in the embrace of Shabbat.

In just under one week, "school" arrives in the embrace of the usual anxieties and excitements. Over the course of the year, our children will spend as much time in the classroom as they do in their home, as much time with their teachers as with their parents. Between parent and teacher are the children, the heart of the matter. The relationship is thus more a trust than a partnership.

Last June, The CJN noted that the trust of education is the bedrock in which are implanted the precious pillars of our society. We also noted that the trust of Jewish education specifically, is the iron workshop forging the next links in the metaphysical chain of Jewish history.

"Anyone truly interested in Jewish continuity", The CJN wrote, "must acknowledge the immeasurable contribution to the future of the community made by the parents and the families of [the] children...learning in day school, congregational schools, or afternoon schools."

The financial burden of Jewish education, for the families whose children are enrolled in Jewish schools and for the communities supporting those families, is very great. Alas, rather than buckle under the enormous weight, some families, understandably, choose to carry a lesser financial load, and some communities, too, choose to allocate their limited resources to other compelling needs, besides that of Jewish education.

But the evidence is ever accumulating: Jewish education is indeed the surest way of ensuring Jewish continuity. For example, across my desk, I recently received the first three reports of 11 that are to be published over the next year on the attitudes of Jewish day school graduates in the United States. The survey is called The Jewishness Quotient of Jewish Day School Graduates.

The survey was conducted by noted educator Dr. Alvin I Schiff and by sociologist Dr. Mareleyn Schneider under the auspices of Yeshiva University's David J. Azrieli Graduate Institute of Jewish Education and Administration. It was funded by Irving Stone of Cleveland. It was the first time a comprehensive poll was conducted on the attitudes and lifestyles of Jewish day school graduates in the United States. It examines the relationship between Jewish education and some of the key indicators of a "Jewish" life such as intermarriage, home and school interaction, Jewish communal involvement, kashrut and Sabbath observance, Israel and Jewish summer camp experiences.

The central finding of the research is that "Jewish education has an overwhelmingly positive impact on adult Jewish identity and behavior, especially on marital patterns, and that the impact is much greater than previously believed."

The research disclosed that only 4.5 percent of the 3,600 graduates who responded to the survey married non-Jewish partners. This figure is in marked contrast to the findings of the the 1990 National Jewish Population Survey which showed an 18 percent intermarriage rate among Jewish day school graduates and an overall 52 percent intermarriage rate among American Jews overall.

So unsettling were the results of the 1990 demographic study that some researchers at Brandeis University and at the Jewish Education Service of North America concluded in clear and perfect simplicity that "assimilation and intermarriage do not occur on a random basis. The extent and type of formal Jewish education are clearly related to levels of Jewish affiliation and activism."

Schiff and Schneider confirm once again through science what our great sages knew through instinct: "It is eminently clear that greater exposure to Jewish day school education yields more pronounced Jewish behavior and attitudes," Schiff writes.

He then goes on to challenge the Jewish establishment: "Because the data confirms that Jewish education is an indispensable tool for the formation of Jewish identity, it behooves Jewish communal agencies and educational systems to support and provide opportunities for continuing Jewish education."

Because the financial burden of formal Jewish education is very great, we begrudge no family that decides not to bear it. But, precisely because that financial burden is so great, we commend the families that persevere, moving slowly under the weight, scratching deep furrows into their freedoms. Their achievement was enshrined by the psalmist who sang: "hazor'im b'dim'ah, b'rinah yiktsoru." Those who sow with tears and great effort, will surely harvest with a sense of great joy.

The first report provides an overview of the survey. The next two reports deal more specifically with attitudes and with the interaction of home and school. Next week I shall write about some of the findings contained in these reports.

Social activist dies

TORONTO — Albert Rose, educator, activist and pioneering social worker, died in Toronto earlier this month of heart failure. He was 78.

Called the father of public and social housing in Ontario, Rose was a passionate crusader for social reforms in welfare, housing and other public policies. He was once hailed by a fellow academic as "the leading Canadian scholar of housing problems."

The late mayor of Toronto, Phil Givens, once said of him, "If Dr. Rose can't help us, there is no power on Earth that can."

He was also a respected commentator on relations between Jews and the genetal community.

The first dean of the University of Toronto's school of social work, Rose's main areas of expertise and advocacy were in housing, social welfare, metropolitan government and social work education and practice.

Born in Toronto, he earned a PhD in 1942 and served in the Canadian army's military intelligence department during World War II. Following the war, he became the first research director of the Toronto Welfare Council. He joined the U of T in 1956 and taught there until 1995.

In all, Rose authored six books, over 100 academic journal articles and countless research reports.

He was involved in many organizations, including Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada.

Rose is survived by his wife Thelma, sons Jeff and Leslie and daughter Janis Takach.

Magen David Adom launches Toronto chapter

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Toronto chapter of the Canadian Friends of Magen David Adom (MDA) has hit the ground running with its first fund-raising event.

About 86 people gathered in Earl Bales Park recently to play bridge, kaluki and tile rummy — and raise about $800 for the Israeli humanitarian organization.

Magen David Adom (which in Hebrew means Red Star of David) is the Israeli equivalent of Canada's Red Cross. It provides ambulance service, blood supplies and disaster response for Israelis regardless of religious or ethnic background. Its blood service supplies 85 per cent of the blood required by Israel's hospitals and 100 per cent of the blood needed by the Israeli Defence Forces.

It also operates a fleet of 600 ambulances and mobile intensive care units and it trains thousands of Israelis in first aid.

The Jewish community in Montreal established a support group for MDA about 20 years ago but Toronto, with the country's largest Jewish population, lagged behind, said Gerald Berley, a spokesman for the Toronto chapter.

Last January the organization's national president Gerald (Ted) Nashman met with Toronto volunteers interested in forming a support chapter. Since then, the Toronto chapter has found premises at the Zionist Centre on Marlee Avenue, elected officers, appointed directors and recruited an impressive list of honorary directors.

Among those serving in that capacity are Rabbi Mark Dratch, MP Art Eggleton, Paul Godfrey, Rabbi Gunther Plaut and former Ontario Premier Bob Rae.

Since it started operating, the Toronto chapter has sent out more than 200 "pushkes" — coin collection boxes — while attempting to raise its profile in the community.

Berley said an MDA ambulance will be brought to Toronto in October to tour various shopping malls to drum up awareness of the organization, particularly among young people.

MDA is also selling first aid kits, as well as tribute, anniversary and numerous other commemorative cards to raise funds.

For more information about the Toronto chapter of MDA, call 416-780-0034.

String quartet set to play at Selichot

TORONTO — This year, for the first time in Toronto, a Conservative synagogue will feature a string quartet as part of their Selichot services.

Beth Tikvah will feature The Festival String Quartet, consisting of four members of The Toronto Symphony Orchestra: Mark Skazinetsky, associate concertmaster; Semyon Pertsovsky, violin; Christopher Redfield, viola; and David Hetherington, cello.

Rabbi Wayne Allen and Cantor Efraim Sapir will lead the service, with the participation of the Beth Tikvah Choir under its conductor, Srul Irving Glick.

The string quartet will perform reflective music beginning at 9:45 p.m. At 11 p.m., refreshments will be served, and the Selichot service will commence at 11:45 p.m. and conclude at 1 a.m.

The idea of a string quartet was conceived and developed by Sapir. Beth Tikvah members Maurice and Renee Kulik sponsored the writing of the special service and Glick made all musical arrangements.

There is no charge for participation in this program and it is open to the community at large. For further information, call 221-3433.

Wallenberg bust to be unveiled Sept. 8

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Organizers are busy putting finishing touches to the unveiling of a bronze bust that will pay tribute to Swedish war hero Raoul Wallenberg.

Hundreds of dignitaries and members of the public are expected at the Sept. 8 unveiling, to take place in Earl Bales Park, not far from the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial.

Sculptor Ernest Raab, who finished the towering, flame-topped Holocaust obelisk in 1991, will take the wraps off a three-metre high bronze bust of Wallenberg, who is credited with rescuing some 100,000 Hungarian Jews from the Nazis in Budapest during World War II.

A year in the making, the work will be located just off Raoul Wallenberg Road in the park. The bust will sit atop a granite pedestal, and organizers say there will be a "surprise" element added just before the unveiling.

Scheduled to take part in the ceremony are human rights activist Prof. Irwin Cotler, CBC journalist Joe Schlesinger, film-maker Harry Rasky and composer Srul Irving Glick, among others.

Also slated to attend are Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy; Ontario Attorney General Charles Harnick; North York Mayor Mel Lastman and diplomats representing Sweden, Hungary, Israel and the United States.

Special guest will be Wallenberg's half-sister, Nina Lagergren, who is scheduled to make the trip from Stockholm.

The scion of a non-Jewish industrialist family in Sweden, Wallenberg was dispatched to Budapest in 1944 to save as many Jews as possible from the Nazis and Hungary's pro-Nazi Arrow Cross. He issued thousands of fake Swedish passports and took Jews to safehouses that flew the neutral Swedish flag. Often, he literally yanked Jews out of lines for trains heading to Auschwitz, claiming they were Swedish citizens.

He also pursuaded the Nazis to call off the destruction of the Budapest Jewish ghetto. In all, Wallenberg saved more Jews during the war than any single government.

But in 1945, he was arrested by invading Soviet troops as an American spy, and taken to Moscow. It was then the mystery of Raoul Wallenberg began.

In 1947, the Soviets issued a statement that Wallenberg died of a heart attack in prison, a position they hold to this day. But for years after that, there were numerous reported sightings of the Swede by former inmates of the Soviet gulag. Many believe Wallenberg lived well into the 1970s and '80s, and may even be alive today.

A few years ago, Cotler chaired an international committee of inquiry into Wallenberg's fate, and Russian authorities produced some new documents and a few of the hero's personal effects. But no news on his true fate.

All those present at the unveiling will be asked to sign a letter to Russian President Boris Yeltsin, asking him to come clean on the file.

Wallenberg was made Canada's only honorary citizen in 1985.

For Raab, Wallenberg holds a special significance. After several escapes from Russian and Hungarian forced labor camps, Raab went to live in Budapest as a gentile in 1944. While smuggling bread one day to Jews in the safehouses, he spotted the Swede leaving.

"He was tall and elegant," the sculptor recalls. "He was an angel."

Raab says the bust will sum up his lifelong dream to honor Wallenberg's heroism and martyrdom.

The project's honorary chair is Toronto philanthropist Leslie Dan. Letters of support have been received from Buckingham Palace and Prime Minister Jean Chretien.

Organizers are asking anyone who was rescued by Wallenberg to attend the ceremony. A special grant in Wallenberg's memory is also planned to aid victims of injustice.

For details, call 416-782-7021.

Unit massacred civilians, Kalejs hearing told

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In July 1941, the pro-Nazi Arajs Kommando (AK) transported Jews from the central prison in Riga, Latvia, to the Bikernieki Forest where they were shot on the spot, an Immigration adjudicator was told last week.

Three hundred to 400 people were taken by bus to the forest and killed in that way, said Gennadij Murnieks, a former member of the Arajs Kommando.

"I had to escort the people from the central prison to the place of the shooting. First they were unloaded from the buses to the spot and there they were made to strip. Then they were driven to the place of the shooting to the pit," Murnieks said in even, dispassionate tones.

"Usually those who wanted to shoot did the shooting. [They] loved vodka best. They were given vodka all the time."

Murnieks, who was imprisoned in the Soviet Union from 1948 to 1962 for his role in the Arajs Kommando, said he participated in three such incidents.

His testimony was videotaped in September 1987 in Riga, as part of the court record in the U.S. immigration case against Konrads Kalejs.

It was replayed last week in Kalejs' Canadian deportation hearing. Canadian authorities are attempting to deport Kalejs on the grounds he is not a genuine visitor to Canada and because he allegedly participated in war crimes. A citizen of Australia, Kalejs was ordered to leave the United States in 1993 because of his role in the persecution of civilians during World War II. He moved to Canada in 1994.

Kalejs has been identified by numerous former comrades-in-arms as a senior lieutenant in the Arajs Kommando. In addition, an RCMP handwriting expert told Immigration adjudicator Anthony Iazzo that Kalejs' signature appeared on three wartime documents linking him to the Arajs Kommando.

Murnieks was the first witness who did not mention Kalejs' name in his testimony. He was called in 1987 by Kalejs' U.S. attorney, apparently because he did not know Kalejs as a member of the AK.

However, under cross-examination by lawyers for the U.S. Justice Department, Murnieks testified about numerous atrocities perpetrated by the Arajs Kommando.

Murnieks said that in December 1941 the AK participated in the liquidation of the Riga Ghetto. He said he helped "collect ... the things of those who were shot. They were stripped and then they were shot."

Twenty thousand Jews were "driven along the street" on foot to the Rumbula railway station near Riga where they were murdered at that time, he said.

Under further prompting, Murnieks admitted he took part in other shootings in the summer and fall of 1941, though he never admitted he actually pulled the trigger. Like other former members of the Arajs Kommando who have testified, he claimed his role was to guard or escort prisoners and that the actual shooting was done by others.

Another example where it appeared Murnieks downplayed his responsibility emerged during two exchanges, first under questioning by Kalejs' U.S. attorney Ivars Berzins and later under cross-examination.

At first, Murnieks said he participated in the burning of a Riga synagogue in July 1941. Viktors Arajs, the leader of the Arajs Kommando, and others hurled grenades into the synagogue while Murnieks and members of the AK stood guard.

"I saw it at a distance. They threw grenades through the windows on the first floor ... [and] into the basement, the lower storey," he said.

But in cross-examination by Justice Department lawyer Ronnie Edelman, further damning details emerged.

"I heard voices from the synagogue and from the rooms that were in the basement," Murnieks said. However, he couldn't recognize the language being spoken because "these were human shoutings."

"Do you mean they were screams and not noticeable words in any language?" he was asked.

"These were the shoutings of an unhappy person just shouting with horror," Murnieks responded.

Kalejs' hearing continues this week.

Middle East soup

The cauldron of Middle East relationships was put over a hot flame last week; and the bilateral atmosphere between Israel and three of its neighbors, Egypt, the Palestinians and Syria, was nearly brought to a boil.

Seeking to pressure Israel for not moving fast enough for his liking on the peace trail with the Palestinians, President Hosni Mubarak publicly threatened to cancel the third regional economic summit planned for November in Cairo. The summit is part of a process initiated two years ago to integrate Israel into the economic structure of the Middle East and to seek large scale Western investment in the region.

Seeking to embarrass the government of Israel in the eyes of the West, the speaker of the Palestinian Council, Ahmad Koray, a former key negotiator with the Israelis, told Israel television that the peace process was near the point of being called off. "I do not want negotiations that cover the expansion of settlements," he told Channel 1.

Seeking to wave a menacing sword before Israeli eyes, Syria was reported to have recently test fired a Scud C missile with a capability of carrying a half-ton chemical or biological warhead that could hit any target in Israel. In addition, Yediot Achronot carried a front page story last week, saying that Syria had moved several army units out of the Bekaa Valley in Lebanon to the Syrian side of the border. The movement of the Syrian troops was viewed by some Israeli analysts as Syrian President Hafez al-Assad's reaction to the warning issued by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu earlier in the week that the IDF would react forcefully to any attack by Hezbollah against Israeli soldiers or civilians.

Newspapers were filled all week with loaded language recalling the risks of "another Yom Kippur war," or lamenting that the peace process was on its deathbed. They fed the tension in the air as much as reported on it.

But by week's end, thankfully, the atmosphere had calmed considerably. The temperature, which had been near boiling, was again brought back to merely simmering, the usual state in the Middle East.

Netanyahu called Mubarak to personally assure him that an Israeli team led by former IDF chief of staff Dan Shomron will soon resume negotiations with the Palestinians. Thus the economic summit, to be attended by more than 3,000 delegates, is now back on track.

Reports confirmed that a senior PLO official, Arafat adviser Mahmoud Abbas, had met with Netanyahu's chief political advisor Dore Gold to discuss the resumption of peace talks. As well, both President Ezer Weizman and Netanyahu announced that they would meet with Palestinian Chairman Yasser Arafat in the near future.

And Foreign Minister David Levy met with U.S. Ambassador Martin Indyk to ask him to personally convey a message of Israel's good will and peaceful intentions regarding negotiations over peace to Assad.

The situation no longer looks as dire as it did one week ago.

In the Middle East one must learn not to always look at the splashes spilling over from the boiling soup. It helps occasionally to notice who is turning up the heat.

Dry Bones

This Week in Canadian Jewish History

August 30, 1907 the Yiddish newspaper The Jewish Daily Eagle (Keneder Adler) was established in Montreal and remained in existence for 80 years. (Canadian Jewish Agenda, CJC 1995)

The record on Zundel I

I draw your attention and the attention of your readers to the editorial in the Montreal Gazette of Aug. 3, which states: "The thought that there is even a remote possibility that hatemonger Ernst Zundel could become a Canadian citizen is profoundly troubling."

It is true that Zundel has not been convicted as a hatemonger in Canada, but he has been convicted in Germany of denying the Holocaust. His pamphlets, which contain similar Holocaust denial lies, are used by anti-Semites and other racists in Germany and many other countries as justification for their illegal activities. Just as the man who hands the firebug a can of gasoline and matches is equally guilty of arson, so in my opinion is Zundel, who incites racists around the world, equally guilty of racism.

Zundel has twice been convicted in Canada by a jury of his peers of knowingly spreading false news, a polite way of saying he is a liar. These convictions were overturned by higher courts, but on points of law, not on the facts. The Supreme Court of Canada did not excuse or condone Zundel's Holocaust denial lies, it simply said that this type of lie is not a crime under the Canadian constitution.

Two juries have found Zundel to be a liar. The Montreal Gazette, other respected newspapers, police officers and many prominent citizens have branded him a liar. I totally agree with these findings.

The record on Zundel II

Re: "Setting the Record Straight" (CJN) Aug. 1.

I wish to further set the record straight in clarifying some most important facts.

Ernst Zundel was convicted twice under Section 177, later Section 181, "False News" by a jury of his peers. The narrow decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, Aug. 27, 1992, did not exonerate Zundel.

One last thing — did the editor read any of the Zundel stuff lately?

Incident inspires Jewish spirit

"Always Remember" is a statement clearly understood in Jewish communities all over the world — two simple words that state the fact that the Jewish people across the world are bonded and will never allow another Holocaust to occur.

In my sheltered private school and in the Jewish community, I have never experienced a serious threat of anti-Semitism. Do I consider myself lucky to be so sheltered or unlucky to have never been exposed to the cruel reality of being a member of a minority? Last week, I discovered that anti-Semitism is our neighbor. The driver who delivers my father's baked kosher goods made a delivery at a certain restaurant. A part of the order was missing. The owner blamed the driver for this and added a comment about his Jewish background — according to the owner, his "dirty Jewish background." His words were a little harsher than that.

I am 16 years old. I learn at school to be proud of who I am. I learn from society to be ashamed. Which should I believe? I'll tell you. We will remain alive just as long as we "Always Remember."

Headline upsets reader

In the July 18 issue, your front page headline read "Arabs React Angrily." This was in reference to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's address to the United States Congress.

It is shameful that a national Jewish newspaper, rather than applauding Netanyahu's statesmanship as he represented the State of Israel with dignity and resoluteness, chose to focus on the Arab reaction.

Netanyahu deserves praise for his intelligent presentation to Congress. The American Congress recognized this accomplishment and acknowledged their approval with several ovations. How unfortunate that those within our own ranks cannot veer from their personal political agenda and accord the prime minister the recognition he deserves as the democratically elected head of state.

Political role of Canada's Jews

'Being a Member of Parliament is the highest service you can render...'

BY SHELDON AND JUDY GODFREY

Part I

The number of Jews elected to Parliament is at a historic low, with only three Jews among the country's 295 Members of Canada's House of Commons holding one percent of the seats — Herb Gray (Windsor West), Sheila Finestone (Montreal-Mount Royal) and Barry Campbell (Toronto-St. Paul's). This is down from nine MPs or over three percent of those elected in 1969.

At the same time, constitutional concerns have caused Canadians of all origins and beliefs to cast about in search of a deeper understanding of what we all have in common and of what we are trying to achieve as a nation. Should politicians be the leaders of this effort? The "Charlottetown referendum" of 1992 marked the first time that a proposal supported by virtually all of Canada's elected politicians was overwhelmingly rejected by the public.

"Being a Member of Parliament is the highest service you can render to a society," says Sheila Finestone. "An MP's office does social work, advocacy and other human concerns in the interests of their constituents."

Election to Parliament to serve the public has been a goal of generations of Jews since the first of our forefathers came to this country. The ability to participate equally and without restriction has been the goal of Jews in the Diaspora since ancient times – an achievement not fully accomplished until the 1850s. Although Canada allowed full participation in government to Jews and other minorities in the colonies of British North America that subsequently formed Canada, well before most other nations, the right of election to Parliament, the highest of the many steps in the historic struggle for all Canada's citizens to be treated as equals, had to be won.

Samuel Hart, the first Jew elected to high public office in Canada, was forced to change his religion in order swear the oath of office required to take his seat as a member of the Nova Scotia Assembly in March 1793.

In 1807 and 1808, Ezekiel Hart was twice elected to the Assembly of Lower Canada, a colony that now makes up part of the Province of Quebec. Both times he was prevented from taking his seat, as the French Canadian majority of the Assembly determined that as a Jew, he was unable to take the oath of office.

In 1861, Selim Franklin was prevented from taking his seat in the Assembly of the Colony of Vancouver Island as a duly elected member for the Town of Victoria. Franklin was later allowed into the assembly following a ruling of the colony's chief justice that there was nothing in the law to prevent his taking his seat, but the legality of Jews holding office had been challenged once again.

It would be tempting to term the treatment of these three men anti-Semitism, but to do so overlooks a number of factors.

Barring members from their duly elected seats in assemblies of Canadian colonies was an occurrence that happened periodically and was by no means directed solely against Jews. Phillip Dorland was not allowed to take his seat as an elected member in the first Assembly of the Province of Upper Canada in 1793 because, as a Quaker, he refused to swear any oath, even though it was a requirement of holding office. Laurence Kavanaugh was not allowed to take his seat in the Assembly of the Colony of Nova Scotia for several years during the 1820s because, as a Roman Catholic, he would not make the required Declaration according the the rites of the Church of England. Even closer to Ezekiel Hart's case, in 1810 Judge Pierre-Amable De Bonne, a French Canadian Roman Catholic, was unseated as a member of the Lower Canada Assembly by the French Canadian majority, ostensibly because judges were not allowed to sit in the House of Commons in Britain. A more probable ground for De Bonne's expulsion was that he, like Ezekiel Hart, supported the English party at a time when French Canadians were exploring the degree of power available to the popularly elected majority in the Assembly.

Godfrey and Judith C. Godfrey, McGill-Queen's University Press, 1995)

In those times, adherence to the state religion was a prerequisite of full citizenship in almost every nation. In the Canadian colonies, prior to 1830, the British administration had used its rules to deny office to some elected representatives by making the highest offices available only to those who would swear an Anglican oath of office.

Jews and the many others of different religions opposed the right of any religious group to become the "official" religion, and to be thus promoted above others to important positions. Jews were joined by French Canadian Catholics, as well as by Presbyterians, Methodists, Quakers and other Protestant dissenters, all of whom had been denied equal access to public office by the adherents of the "official" Church of England.

As a result, between 1830 and 1850, the government of Britain finally agreed, colony by colony, to the removal of the prohibitions on persons of different races and religions holding elected office or higher civil positions.

It is perhaps significant that the same French Canadian majority that had expelled Ezekiel Hart from the Assembly 20 years earlier, led the movement to grant equality before the law to persons of different creeds. Throughout the 1820s and '30s, the French Canadian-dominated Lower Canada Assembly passed a number of unprecedented egalitarian bills removing restrictions to the legal equality of Protestant Dissenters and Jews in the province.

It was the Colonial office in Britain that prevented many of these bills from passing into law. One of the exceptions which was approved for the colony as a law by British officials in 1832, was a bill passed declaring that "persons professing the Jewish religion were entitled to all the rights and privileges of the other subjects of His Majesty." This law was passed when no Jews held seats in the Lower Canada Assembly.

Upper Canada, now part of Ontario, removed all remaining restrictions against Jews holding public office by its Oaths Act of 1833 and by the Governor's Instructions five years later. The Maritime Colonies ended restrictions against Roman Catholics holding office in the 1830s, and removed all remaining restrictions against Jews by 1850.

"Toleration" was the method used to restrict minorities from full civil and political equality, including the right to hold office. The heterogeneous population of the colonies that became Canada had a common goal of removing "tolerance" as the principle underlying the privileges which allowed access to office and important civil positions only to members of the established group.

Toleration has had a long established legal meaning in Britain. The effect of the English Toleration Act of 1688 was to exempt certain named Protestant Dissenters from being punished for openly practising religions other than the official religion of the Church of England, while retaining the penal laws for Roman Catholics. At the same time, the act did not grant any exemption to Unitarians or Jews. The benefits of the act were extended to Catholics in 1791, to Unitarians in 1813 and to Jews in 1846. By that point, all of these dissenting groups were finally legally "tolerated" although some other rights, such as being allowed a seat in Parliament, were still denied them.

Citizen Tom Paine, the American Revolutionary war patriot, put it succinctly. "Toleration," he said, "is not the opposite of intolerance, but is the counterfeit of it. Both are despotisms." Toleration, Paine realized, meant inequality and control by only one group within a society.

By 1800, thinkers in both the United States and France had rejected toleration in favor of equality, although implementing legislation followed much later. In 1790, the year after the French Revolution, the Jews of France petitioned the National Assembly asking that "equality" rather than "tolerance" be the object of the new code. According to the petition, "the word toleration, which, after so many centuries and so many acts of intolerance, appeared to be a word full of humanity and reason, is no longer suitable to a nation that wishes to firmly place its rights upon the eternal foundations of justice. America, to which politics will owe so many useful lessons, has rejected the word from its code as a term tending to compromise individual liberty and to sacrifice certain classes of men to other classes. To tolerate is, in fact, to suffer that which you could, if you wished, prevent and prohibit."

In 1839, Isaac Leeser, spiritual leader of Philadelphia's Mikve Israel Congregation, elaborated on why the United States had chosen equality instead of toleration. "Where equality is the law of the land, there is no privileged class," he wrote to the editor of the Philadelphia Gazette. "Liberty precludes the idea of toleration." Jews could never have long-term security in a nation where tolerance rather than legal equality is the operative principle.

In the Canadian colonies, the English Toleration Act was never formally applied. Equality rather than toleration became the guiding force by 1851 when the Church of England lost its official position as the established Church of the Province of Canada (now Ontario and Quebec).

J. C. Morrison, the Member of Parliament who introduced the subject in the assembly, spoke for almost all its members when he said that "very few indeed argue in favor of a state religion in this country, peopled as it is with persons from all creeds and from all nations, equally entitled to the favor and protection of the Government." Indeed the population of Canada in 1851 was already a multi-racial, multi-religious mix.

In a multicultural state like Canada, where no culture or religion is dominant, equality, not mere tolerance, has been the law for almost 150 years. In this respect, Canada is light years ahead of much of the rest of the world – the United Nations only last year called for an "International Year of Tolerance."

Thus in 1856, when George Benjamin was elected to become the first Jew to sit in the Parliament of the Province of Canada, he was confronted by no obstacles to holding the highest offices and was later even asked to serve in the cabinet led by John Sandfield Macdonald.

By the time that Canada came into being as country in 1867, it was already a unique place where individuals of different religions, and arguably even of different races, had the legal right to be treated equally by the government, not just to be tolerated. These concepts had been widely adopted earlier in Canada than in Britain or many of the individual United States.

In the next article, the question is asked: If having Jewish MPs was a symbol of equality, would a lack of Jewish MPs be regarded as a step backward? Would there ever come a time when we could stop being vigilant in defence of our rights without being in danger of reverting to becoming only a "tolerant society."

Reflections on Zionism, Jewish people

The elections are over. The people have spoken. A new page is being opened, with new problems, new worries, new uncertainties, a new leadership, even as the smoke still existing over the last two decades — the Lebanon war, the intifadah, the Oslo accord — is clearing away. It is a good time for some fundamental reflections on Zionism, Israel and the destiny of the Jewish people. And the new government's 100 days of grace are not yet over.

By Emil Fackenheim

I will ask three questions, give to each a clear-cut answer, and if this seems a tough job in our "post-modern" world, I will use the privilege of posing a fourth question for which I don't have an answer.

"Why are we here?" This means why are the Jewish people in Israel and why am I in Jerusalem and not in Toronto? My answer: without the secularists (= "the non-religious" in Israeli terms), "the religious" among us would still be sitting (assuming we were alive) somewhere in Europe waiting for the Messiah; and without the "religious" we would have gone to Uganda. The move to Israel is a shared religious-secular enterprise, composed, on the one hand, of religious memory of past and longing for future, and, on the other, of secular impatience with waiting and secular self-confidence.

"Why are we here now?" is my second question. We are tired of waiting, but more importantly, more profoundly, we are commanded to stop it. The Jews of Chelm (in which Jews invent absurd solutions for real problems) have to try to find a job for a guy with two left feet. Here is the job: he'll go to the end of the town and wait for the Messiah. The pay is poor, but it is a steady job. Well, the job was not steady after all, for that Jew got murdered.

Filled with religious longing and secular self-confidence — or whatever remnant of either was left in a people who were themselves a remnant — they returned to the Land, built up a state capable, until now, of self-defence, and, by the Law of Return, made it the Land of the whole people.

Will we stay? Some say we were interlopers at the start and are interlopers now. The Crusaders came, left, and left behind ruins surrounded by sand; so it will be with the Jews. But whereas they came, we came back; whereas they came and left, we came back to stay. And whereas they came, left, and left behind ruins surrounded by sand, we came back to rebuild Jerusalem.

But will we retain the stamina, refuse to give up on hope? To that I don't know the answer, and nobody else knows either and will not know for a long time.

Aliyah must undergo radical change

Part II

In order to save the ideal of aliyah from irrelevance and extinction, the call to aliyah must undergo a radical transformation. The community of crisis which fuelled interest in aliyah, making it into a live option for Jews, no longer exists.

By David Hartman

However difficult it is for the Zionist movement to admit it, the traditional survival-based language of aliyah no longer mirrors the situation of the community today. If Zionists are to avoid ceasing to discuss aliyah altogether, they must understand the difference between the contexts of "mirroring" and of "aspiration."

Aliyah must regain the inherent force of "aliyah" – a word that implies "going up," aspiring to, striving for something higher. It must become a concept that challenges, that points to new possibilities and alternatives, that disturbs complacency and self-satisfied acceptance of the status quo.

How do you make the language of aliyah resonate in people's souls without sounding anachronistic or pointless? How do you move the focus of "aliyah language" from crisis to personal conviction?

Preparing the Groundwork

You cannot speak about aliyah to people who do not appreciate the significance of Jewish spiritual aspiration. A crucial factor, therefore, is the quality of daily Jewish living. If you are a Jew in Dallas, Texas, then one day you may want to be a Jew in Israel. But if you are not a Jew in Dallas, you will never want to be a Jew in Jerusalem.

Receptivity to the language of aliyah is a function of the sense of Jewishness that permeates a person's daily life. The Aliyah Committee cannot be separated from the Jewish Education Committee.

For my father, being Jewish and living as a committed Torah Jew were natural and self-evident. His instinctive answer to my asking him about the meaning of Jewish observance was: "This is how my father lived and how his father lived!" For him, my questions were irrelevant because of the inherent power of the past that informed his present identity and practice. He could not sing a different nigun.

> Knowledge and personal conviction were necessary to make tradition part of my life

While this was true of my father's world, for me and my generation these were no longer pointless questions. The tradition had ceased to be self-evident. Knowledge and personal conviction were necessary if the tradition was to become a live option in my life. I had to choose to be Jewish.

Although I know that my family and my early Yeshiva education had profound influences on my life, I nevertheless realize that, in contrast to my father's Jewish experience, the gift of my past had to be re-appropriated through knowledge and personal conviction. I had to reclaim the past anew.

Leaving Montreal where I had built a synagogue and worked tirelessly to further Jewish institutions and university studies, wasn't simple. Leaving a productive rabbinic and university career and uprooting a family from a normal and comfortable way of life were not easy decisions.

As I said to someone who asked me why I made aliyah: "I was among the few people in my congregation who listened to my sermons! What could I do? I was so inspired by the rhetoric of aspiration that I forgot about reality!"

After making aliyah, however, I soon realized that Israel was not exactly what my sermons were about. It took me several years to bridge the gap between the Israel of my drashot and dreams and the manic-depresquality of daily life in Israel.

Without the powerful and inspiring image of a Jewish national spiritual renaissance – of what Israel "could be" – I could not have persevered in facing the strains, the shtick and — mishegasim of Israel life.

The language of aspiration is a corrective to the sense of futility and despair that can undermine the conviction and commitment to effect serious changes in Israeli society.

The "rhetoric" of hope and new possibilities is not a regressive escape into childish fantasy. It is essential for sustaining the vitality of a broader perception of what human life could be. I am happy, therefore, that I listened to my sermons!

Aliyah and Jewish education must be understood as integrated and inter-dependent issues. All the Holocaust horror stories and warnings of future persecutions will not move Jews to leave the comforts of Berkeley or Los Angeles for Israel. We must let go of the crutches of anti-Semitism and alienation in order to create and sustain conviction – in order to move aliya from "mirroring" to "aspiration."

Southern Baptists

For as long as I can remember, the northern Baptists of the United States could be counted on to defend the rights of all citizens, and in the 19th century were strongly anti-slavery. The Southern Baptist Convention, on the other hand, was more conservative, pro-slavery, but generally friendly to Jews, especially when it came to Zionism. They were evangelical Christians who believed that the Holy Land had to be restored to the Jews.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

But a serious change occurred this summer, when the Southern Baptist Convention re-entered the field of missionary work among the Jews. A resolution was passed that declared: "Be it resolved that we direct our energies and resources toward the proclamation of the gospel to the Jewish people."

This is not a new brand of anti-Semitism; quite the contrary. Many of the Baptists feel a special attraction to our people and therefore care for our spiritual welfare and are especially moved to target us with their latest spiritual offensive. The Baltimore Jewish Times reported that the Colonial Baptist Church, which recently purchased the facility of a Conservative synagogue, is now housing a Hebrew-Christian group calling itself B'nai Avraham — despite a promise prior to the sale that no missionary activities would take place.

Jews are up in arms over this whole new development, which flies in the face of long-standing cooperation on many communal projects. I first learned about this newest confrontation on the Internet, where I was urged to join the battle against this latest attack on our faith. Also, Dennis Prager recently devoted a whole issue of The Prager Perspective to this issue. Among his observations are these:

Whatever theological or social arguments Jews may offer, the biggest reason for our reaction against Christian missionizing among Jews is the Jewish anger against the Christian world. First we were accused of murdering God; then we were persecuted, ghettoized, expelled, equated with the Devil and all too often killed; and now we are once again grist for the conversion mill.

To be sure, seeking converts is permissible in an open, democratic society, but somehow the burden of 2,000 years of having been the targets of religious assaults weighs heavy upon us. While the majority of us are most likely immune to such efforts, there are those who are vulnerable, for whatever reason. The survival of Judaism in America is not at stake, says Prager. He has, however, two other concerns:

"First, I fear that the inevitable failure of Southern Baptist attempts to convert the Jews may lead to anti-Jewish sentiments among a group that is not so predisposed [i.e., to be anti-Jewish]. Second, I fear for America. I believe that a vibrant moral Christianity is necessary to save this country from its moral descent. Yet the more Christianity is identified with the belief that God cares only for those with a certain type of faith and sends to hell all good and just people who take a different road to Him, the fewer Americans will take it seriously."

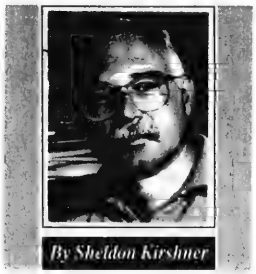
Former Soviet diplomat criticizes Moscow's policies

For nearly a quarter of a century, Anatoly Dobrynin was the Soviet Union's nonpareil ambassador, its representative in the United States. Dobrynin arrived in Washington at the age of 43 — the youngest person ever to hold that position — and left when he was 67. He knew six presidents — from Kennedy to Reagan — and through the Cold War served as the main back channel between the White House and the Kremlin.



By Sheldon Kirshner

During his stewardship, Dobrynin was called upon to cope with, among other events, the Six Day War and the Yom Kippur War. He also monitored the Soviet Jewry movement.

In his cogent and revealing memoirs, In Confidence (Random House, $42), he treats these topics with refreshing candor, thus confirming his credentials as a balanced observer.

First off, Dobrynin takes his masters to task for having broken diplomatic relations with Israel during the Six Day War. "It was an emotional step," he writes bluntly. "In the long term this proved to be a grave miscalculation because it practically excluded the Soviet Union from any serious role in a Middle East settlement."

The misguided policy, he observes, left the Soviet Union with little flexibility. "We often blindly followed our Arab allies, who in turn used us to block many initiatives that were advanced for a peaceful settlement."

He adds: "We followed the Arabs in demanding immediate withdrawal of the Israeli troops (from the occupied areas) while the Arab countries remained vague about recognizing Israel after withdrawal. That was an unrealistic approach."

Dobrynin urged the Soviet leader, Leonid Brezhnev, to restore ties with Israel. In the late 1970s, Brezhnev proposed a gradual restoration of relations, and the Politburo instructed the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to examine the question. But the exercise was vetoed by Andrei Gromyko, the foreign minister, and Mikhail Suslov, the chief Communist ideologue. Not till the mid-1980s did Moscow finally get around to rectifying its policy with regard to Israel.

Natan Sharansky

The Soviet Union, Dobrynin says, generally opposed the decision by Egypt and Syria to launch the Yom Kippur War. Nor did Moscow believe the Arabs could win it.

In the penultimate days of the war, with the Israelis poised to annihilate the Egyptians' besieged Third Army, Brezhnev called an urgent meeting of the Politburo. The defence minister insisted on an impressive "demonstration of our military presence in Egypt and Syria." Cooler heads prevailed and Moscow prudently did not intervene.

"It would have been reckless both politically and militarily," Dobrynin notes, "for at that time the Soviet Union was not prepared to mount immediately a large-scale intervention in the region. And even if we could have done so, it would have transformed the Arab-Israeli war into a direct clash between the Soviet Union and the United States."

In assessing Moscow's policy toward Jewish emigration, Dobrynin is scathing.

"Our biggest mistake was to stand on pride and not let as many Jews go as wanted to leave. It would have cost us little and gained us much. Instead, our leadership turned it into a test of wills that we eventually lost."

The policy, he writes, was "a serious and permanent source of irritation" with the West and with the United States in particular. Dobrynin and his colleagues in the Soviet Embassy tried to change it, but to no avail.

Surprisingly enough, Gromyko professed to have no knowledge of one of the leading Refuseniks of the era, Anatoly (Natan) Sharansky.

When Jimmy Carter raised the issue at a White House meeting, Gromyko said in all sincerity that he had never heard of Sharansky. Carter was so nonplussed by his apparent ignorance that he dropped the subject.

Dobrynin assumed that it was all a trick. But as Gromyko left Carter's office, he asked in a low voice, "Who really is Sharansky?"

Dobrynin offers an explanation. "It emerged that he knew little indeed about the Sharansky case, because he had instructed his subordinates in Moscow not to bother him with what he called 'absurd' matters."

Memoirs of ghetto policeman seared by realism and despair

In the bulging annals of Holocaust literature, not a single work written by a Jewish policeman from a ghetto has been published. But with the publication of Calel Perechodnik's diary, Am I A Murderer? (HarperCollins, $35), this yawning gap has been bridged.

Perechodnik, who describes himself as "a Jew of average intelligence," was born in Warsaw in 1916 into a middle-class family. He studied agronomy in Paris, writing his thesis on the cultivation of hemp in Poland, and after returning home he married Anna Nusfeld, who bore him a child.

In February 1941, fearing for their safety, he became a ghetto policeman in a small town near Warsaw called Otwock. Jewish policemen who worked for the Germans were considered traitors by the majority of Jews. Judging by his self-loathing observations, Perechodnik's opinion of his fellow policemen was also scathing. They were a corrupt lot, but in Otwock they were worse, not even bothering to warn local Jews of their impending deportation.

Sensing imminent danger, Perechodnik's wife wanted to hide herself and her 2-year-old daughter, Athalie, in a cellar. Perechodnik dissuaded her from doing so, having been assured by the commander of the Jewish police that no harm would come to Anna or Athalie if he brought them to Otwock's main square.

On Aug. 19, 1942, Perechodnik complied with his commandant's suggestion. But to his horror, Anna and Athalie, as well as some 8,000 other Jews, were herded into waiting boxcars bound for the Treblinka death camp.

Perechodnik was spared that fate. A Polish socialist, a train conductor, saved his life and that of his parents by providing a refuge in a friend's apartment. Perechodnik, however, did not survive the war. He perished in a Warsaw bunker in August 1944, leaving behind a diary — a "deathbed confession," as he put it — which he had written in 1943 and which he entrusted to a Polish acquaintance.

The original manuscript, now in Yad Vashem, gathered dust for almost 50 years before being published in Poland in 1993. The English edition, edited and translated by Frank Fox, is a poignant document seared by realism and steeped in despair.

Perechodnik, a pre-war Revisionist Zionist and Polish nationalist, believed in the brotherhood of man and in the inevitability of anti-Semitism's demise. His judgment was faulty, to be charitable. Perechodnik experienced acts of human kindness, but they were the exception rather than the norm. And in Am I A Murderer? he pours out his inconsolable grief and his hard-bitten disillusionment in a torrent of emotion.

Despite our sins we are never alone

By RABBI KENNETH J. KATZ

We humans err and sin daily. We bury our sins and errors carefully, thoroughly, instinctively. As teenagers put it these days, "It's in the past now," meaning, "It's buried, it's over, forget it."

We hope and expect that time, like the earth, will make buried things decompose. And time does so for us humans. But God, as the machzor so inconveniently reminds us, forgets nothing: "There is no forgetting before Your throne of glory, nor is there aught hidden from Your eyes."

Sometimes for us, buried things may come back, unexpectedly and with force. When they do, it is special and unusual, the stuff of drama or of nightmares — as when the brothers of Joseph meet Joseph again in Egypt. A dramatic shocking return of past sins makes us repent and change.

But usually this is not how it happens. Like the cat, we instinctively bury and forget and think no more of those things. But before God who forgets nothing, we are all compromised. All of us. And should we, now and then, think of this, how can we hope ever to stand before God?

Consider a scene in this week's Torah reading, Ki Tavo: "Moses charged the people, saying, 'After you have crossed the Jordan, the following shall stand on Mt. Gerizim when the blessing for the people is spoken: Simeon, Levi, Judah ... And for the curse, the following shall stand on Mt. Ebal: Reuben, Gad ... The Levites shall then proclaim in a loud voice to all the men of Israel [the following curses]...' " (27:11-14)

It is an impressive scene. Hundreds of thousands of people are present. Six tribes stand on one mountain, six on another, announcing words of blessing and curse.

But there is, according to our rabbis, something buried on Mt. Gerizim, a compromising secret. In the book of Genesis, Jacob's sons, Simeon and Levi, massacred the men of Shechem, near Mt. Gerizim (Genesis 34). Disgusted with this massacre, Jacob says to his sons, "You have made my name stink."

Jacob then confiscates any idols his family has plundered from Shechem and hides them under an oak tree. "Jacob shivered them in pieces, and buried the bits under an oak upon Mt. Gerizim, uprooting the tree with one hand, concealing the remains of the idols in the hollow left in the earth, and planting the oak again with one hand." (L. Ginzberg, The Legends of the Jews, I. 413).

Shards of idols, memories of massacre under the very feet of the tribes of Simeon, Levi and Judah as they stand on Mt. Gerizim to bless or to curse. And the curses are directed against those with secrets — secret assaults, secret bribes, secret moving of a boundary marker and secret idols! The evidence of sins they are now to denounce are under their very feet! How can they stand before God, being so compromised?

But to ask the question is to answer it. In the Torah, God asks them to stand there. We are all compromised, but God, through graciousness we do not understand, wishes us to stand before Him nonetheless.

The machzor also says, "You are slow to anger and ready to forgive."

Sometimes when faced with misfortune, we may grumble that God has abandoned us. I would suggest we marvel instead that, though by nature we continually sin and forget and sin and forget, somehow God continues to crave our company.

Author makes debut by tackling Holocaust

Fugitive Pieces, by Anne Michaels (McClelland & Stewart, $19.99).

For her debut novel, Anne Michaels, a Toronto award-winning poet, chose a formidable and daunting subject — the Holocaust and its effect on a number of interrelated lives. She succeeds beyond expectation because of her acute sensibility, her unusual range of knowledge and her remarkable use of language.

Seven-year-old Jakob Beer is orphaned in Poland when his parents are murdered by the Nazis and his sister abducted. Hiding in terror as the atrocities are committed, Jacob's mind and consciousness are irrevocably seared.

A fugitive "bog-boy," Jakob is plucked from the slime of a buried Polish city by Athos Roussos, a Greek geologist, and taken to his home on a remote Greek island where he is slowly nursed back to health and patiently educated.

At war's end, Roussos is offered a position as a professor in the University of Toronto's Geography Department. Together, Roussos and his young charge explore Toronto, discovering its ravines and streams, its flora and fauna, as if the entire city was an archeological tel.

After Roussos is killed in an Athens car accident, Jakob returns to the Greek island to continue his career as poet and translator. He sets down the incidents of his life — and his innermost thoughts — in a series of notebooks from which the events of the novel are taken.

In the book's second part, Ben, a young Toronto scholar and a child of survivors meets 60-year-old Jakob and senses in him the attributes of wisdom and equanimity that he needs. In his quest for greater self-understanding, Ben seeks and finds Jakob's notebooks in Greece.

What is astonishing about this book is its poetic imagery, sense of place and delineation of memorable characters. Numerous passages should be slowly savored and then reread for heightened meaning and arresting language.

The author does not dwell on the Holocaust, but some passages reveal its horrors. "In Warsaw, a nurse hid children under her skirt, passing through the ghetto gates, until one evening — gentle twilight descending on those typhus-infected, lice-infested streets — the nurse was caught, the child thrown into the air and shot like a tin can, the nurse given the 'Nazi pill': one bullet in the throat ... I didn't know that when there were too many for the ovens, corpses were burned in open pits, flames ladled with human fat ... that men were untangling limbs, the flesh of friends and neighbors, wives and daughters, coming off in their hands."

Again, "When the prisoners were forced to dig up the mass graves, the dead entered them through their pores and were carried through their bloodstreams to their brains and hearts ... as they felt another man's and another's blood-soaked hair through their fingers, the diggers begged forgiveness. And those lost lives made molecular passage into their hands."

This novel is clearly not for all readers. There is limited plot, negligible action, and the oblique and intricate prose often gets in the way of quick comprehension. But those in search of a reading experience of rare power and beauty will cherish Fugitive Pieces.

Jewish Life

By RABBI MARK DRATCH

Comparative Law

A pregnant 21-year-old glue-sniffing woman is the subject of a legal battle in Winnipeg. In an attempt to protect her unborn child from being damaged by the woman's addiction, a judge placed the woman, against her will, under the care of Winnipeg Child and Family Services and sent her to hospital for treatment.

Does the fetus have rights under Jewish law?

Jewish law does not grant an independent identity to a fetus. In fact, ubar yerekh imo, it is considered a mere limb or organ of its mother and so, for example, a pregnant woman sentenced by the court to death is executed immediately, despite her pregnancy (Arakhin 7a). Thus, in Jewish law, there can be no clash of rights. The mother and child are one and the same.

Halachah does not grant full human status to a fetus. The Torah itself does not view harm to a fetus in the same way it views harm to its mother. Thus, "If people strive together and hurt a woman with child so that her fruit depart, and yet no harm follow, he shall surely be fined" (Exodus 21:22). Harm here is physical damage to the mother. The Torah did not consider the miscarriage to be "harm" and demanded only demei veladot, compensation for the potential monetary loss that was caused.

While some authorities maintain that abortion is murder of potential life, and while abortion is prohibited except in extreme circumstances, one who performs an abortion does not have the same culpability as one who murders a viable human being (Hil. Rotzeiach 2:6). Other authorities maintain that abortion is not murder at all, but hashchatat zera levatala, the destruction of potential procreative possibilities, or chabalah, a form of physical assault.

Nevertheless, Jewish law and morality are vitally concerned about the welfare of the unborn. One Talmudic sage warns people against engaging in certain forms of sexual behavior because of the potential harm that such behavior might cause to the fetus (Nedarim 20a-b). And the sources are full of advice to parents as to what they might do to enable the birth of physically and spiritually healthy children.

In this case, Jewish law requires intervention to ensure the welfare of both the fetus and the mother. Halachah obligates all of us to engage in safe and healthful activities (Hil. De'ot 4) and proscribes behavior that is harmful (Choshen Mishpat 420:31). Thus, the mother would not be permitted to sniff glue, even if she were not pregnant, and the obligations of not standing idly by the blood of others and of rebuke (Lev. 19:16-17) require society to intervene in whatever ways are effective, even against her will, to stop this illicit and dangerous activity.

While these obligations apply to all addicts, this particular case certainly arouses greater compassion and concern for the welfare of the vulnerable and innocent unborn child whose future is in her mother's hands — and in ours as well.

The Jewish calendar

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

We are now well into the month of Elul, the last month of the year preceding Rosh Hashanah. This is traditionally a time to take stock of our conduct during the past year, look at our goals for the coming one... and, of course, pick up a new Jewish calendar. You CAN get a calendar the old fashioned way by walking into your nearest Judaica store or bakery. Or you can do it the easy way... by travelling on the Jewish Highway.

There are two basic kinds of calendar programs on the Internet. Some programs are built right into a World Wide Web page. Typically, you type in the information you want, hit enter and you get your response. You can only use these pages while you are connected to the Internet. These calendars are all free and will work whether you're running a Windows- or Macintosh-based computer.

There are also some calendar programs which you can download onto your computer and use whenever you want. These programs are usually more sophisticated and may or may not be free. Also, a Windows calendar program will only run on a Windows-based computer and a Macintosh calendar on a Mac.

First, here are some of the Jewish Calendar programs that run directly on the Internet: If you want to check today's Jewish date, go to [gopher://israel.nysernet.org:70/00/about/cdate] and it will appear automatically. The "Yom Tov Calendar Page" [http://www.torah.org/learning/yomtov/calendar.htm] does a basic job well. It will give you a list of the dates for all Jewish Holidays until 2006.

The "PAO Calendar Conversion Utility" [http://www.jewish.org/pao.calendar.convert.html] goes a step further. In addition to generating lists of the Holidays, you can also print out the dates of all the Torah reading portions.

Using "The AIR Project Hebrew Calendar," [http://www-syntim.inria.fr/htbin/air/hebrewcalendar2.pl] you can create and print out the more familiar month-at-a-glance calendar which lists Holidays and Shabbat Torah-portions. It allows you to generate those calendars by using either the civil or Jewish months.

"The Perpetual Jewish/Civil Calendar" [http://www.uwm.edu/cgi-bin/corre/calendar] is a bit different. It lets you create two parallel calendars with the Jewish months on the left and the civil months on the right.

Now for the programs which you can download: Joseph Kohn's "Hebrew Calendar" [http://users.aol.com/calmaven/calmaven.htm] is a sophisticated program for Windows. You can double-check the Jewish date you were born on, look up a Yahrzeit date or figure out when that Bar or Bat Mitzvah is going to fall. You can even enter your time zone, latitude, longitude and elevation in order to create accurate candle-lighting times!

Here are some other Windows programs which are worth a look: Lester Penner's "JCAL - The Jewish Calendar Program" [ftp://ftp.virtual.co.il/pub/software/msdos/calendar/jcal753.zip]; Charles Marcus "Hebrew Date Conversion Program" [ftp://ftp.virtual.co.il/pub/software/msdos/calendar/hdate.zip]; and Michael Mefford's "Schedule" [ftp://ftp.virtual.co.il/pub/software/msdos/calendar/schedheb.zip].

And finally for Macintosh users, there's Frank Yellin's "Jewish Calendar" [ftp://ftp.virtual.co.il/pub/software/mac/jcal.source.hqx]. (Just a reminder that many of these programs are "shareware." Shareware is software provided to you on the honour system. Try it. And if you like it, you are expected to pay for it. And what better time to take stock of all those shareware programs you're using but have forgotten to pay for than before Rosh Hashanah.)

Now that you've found your ideal calendar, you might want to understand more about why the mostly lunar-based Jewish Calendar is the way it is. For a clear explanation, check out [http://members.aol.com/jewfaq/calendar.htm]. The Genesis Project [http://www.torah.org/learning/yomtov/assorted.htm] also examines the history of the calendar and has a brief look at the origins of the names of the Jewish months.

Though all of the programs I've mentioned do a fine job of calculating dates, even the Internet still can't create a glossy calendar that comes with lovely photos of sunrise over Masada or sunset at the Kotel that we are used to. Maybe that bakery shop calendar isn't threatened, yet.

JRCC campaign director returns to Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When Yaacov Erez, campaign director of the Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRCC), returns to Israel with his wife and son after almost 10 years in Canada, he will leave behind a legacy of commitment, hard work and loyalty to the Jewish community.

In his second tour of duty here, (his first was from 1977 to 1983 as national executive vice-president of Canadian Technion Society in Montreal) Erez, a retired colonel in the Israeli army, served as executive director, Canadian ORT, Ontario region, before joining JRCC.

"While in Canada, I've gotten to know the various Jewish communities from coast to coast and I've made many friends. These friendships are the treasure that I will bring to Israel with me."

Fundraising, though a difficult job, is made a lot easier in Canada, Erez says, because the Jewish community is committed to Israel. "Its support, care and involvement are heartwarming to an Israeli like me. Support does not only come in times of emergency — it goes on all the time.

"In my capacity as fundraiser for a number of communal organizations, I was constantly encouraged at seeing heads of major corporations take the time to sit down and listen to a representative from Israel. Most of the time, they did lend their support."

Erez, 60, who served in the Israeli army for 23 years, last in the Yom Kippur War as artillery division commander at the Suez Canal, plans to keep on working.

"During my civil career in Israel, I was the manager of the first North American-built mall, developed by David Azrieli, and I would like to continue working along those lines. We are returning to Israel because it is our home. Our three daughters and grandchildren are there. We extended our stay several times because of contracts, but in our hearts, Israel is always first.

"I was in Montreal working for the Technion when the war in Lebanon broke out and I went to Beirut without telling my family where I was going. I was a civilian, but I felt I should be there. When something happens in Israel, we are all on call."

As for the future of Israel, Erez says that although "I am not a political guy, I know that the country must continue to search for peace. I do not see any other alternative. I lost a son-in-law in the war in Lebanon and I have seen too many other people pay the ultimate price to see Israel live in peace.

"We must negotiate peace from a basis of strength. The Arabs will respect us and negotiate with us only if they realize that it is impossible militarily to destroy Israel. Otherwise there is no exit from the cycle of wars. I do not call peace with Egypt or Jordan real peace, but it is definitely better than meeting on the battlefields again. The fact is, when we talk, the canons are silent."

Thornhill Community Mikveh open house

TORONTO — The Thornhill Community Mikveh will host a Rosh Hashanah open house at 7:30 p.m. Sept. 11 for those interested in learning about the history of mikvah and immersing prior to the new year.

This marks the fifth year that the Liberal Jewish community has conducted mikvah information sessions before Rosh Hashanah.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel, will begin the evening with a talk about the origins of mikvah, halachic interpretations regarding immersion and a look at how Liberal Judaism interprets the ritual.

Following Rabbi Goldstein's talk, there will be a tour of the mikvah, which was opened in 1995, and an opportunity for both men and women to immerse.

Catherine Bianco, shomeret for the mikvah, said, "Many Liberal Jewish women interpret the ritual of mikvah with an emphasis on proactive change. This information session near the eve of Rosh Hashanah offers the perfect opportunity to increase ritual practice.

The Thornhill Community Mikveh, located at 36 Atkinson Ave. in Thornhill, is open to all Jews by appointment.

Educator Manya Lipshitz promoted study of Yiddish

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Manya Lipshitz, an educator and activist, died on July 27 at the age of 89, after a lengthy illness.

For more than a quarter of a century, she taught Yiddish and Jewish history to hundreds of students. Her genuine love of children and her love of Yiddish inspired her students. Even after her retirement, students would stop her in the street and tell her she had affected their lives and developed their love of the Yiddish language and the culture of their parents and grandparents.

Her life also reflected the trauma of war and revolution of this century. Following World War I and the Russian revolution, at the age of 13, Margolia Kantorowicz (as she was then known), the youngest of nine children, left Bialystok, Poland and went with her sister to the USSR.

She joined the Twelfth Jewish Children's Work Commune in Vitebsk, Russia, where many of the children were orphaned.

Faced with poverty, food shortages and a lack of adult leadership, she and the older children became the leaders and teachers. And at the commune, she began writing plays and poetry. In 1923, she entered the Teachers' Seminary in Vitebsk.

Manya Lipshitz

Moved to Toronto

She came to Canada in 1926 to join her brothers in Montreal. After graduating from the Teachers' Seminary in New York, she took up her first teaching position in Canada at the Montreal Peretz School.

In Montreal, she married journalist and editor Sam Lipshitz in 1930. They moved to Toronto and she began teaching at the Morris Winchevsky Jewish School of the Labor League, a left-wing fraternal organization, later known as the United Jewish Peoples Order (UJPO).

In 1956, after the revelations of the Stalinist crimes in the Soviet Union, she and her husband and many others left the UJPO and organized the New Fraternal Jewish Association.

In her book Bletlach fon a Stormisher Zeit, published in Yiddish in 1977 and later translated into English as Time Remembered, Manya documents the historical trauma of the Russian revolution, the economic and political upheaval, the insecurity of Jewish life, separation from family and the disillusionment with the Communist regime. The book also includes the writings of three remarkable journals of the Vitebsk children's commune which were rediscovered some 50 years after they were written.

The achievements of Sam and Manya Lipshitz are interwoven in their 66 years of marriage. Their partnership is described by Sam as "an ideal, harmonious marriage — we always worked as a team."

Their love of the State of Israel led to the establishment of the Manya Lipshitz Amal Scholarship Foundation.

In his eulogy, her grandson Dr. Eric Cohen spoke of his grandmother's "warmth, her unassuming strength, her commitment to equality and social justice, her devotion to Yiddish culture and the cultural life of the community at large."

Manya Lipshitz will be remembered by many as a remarkable teacher, humanitarian and acclaimed author and poet.

Sam and Manya have five grandchildren and two great-grandchildren from their two children, Dr. May Cohen, who recently retired as associate dean of Health Service at McMaster University, and Joseph Lipman, a professor of mathematics at Purdue University.

לעבן מיטן עקספּרעס-צוג
פון אַלעק סילוווער

Nemsila deportation case back on track

Federal prosecutors, supported by four Jewish organizations, appealed that decision and last week, Jerome held that Nemsila was never legally domiciled in Canada.

To be domiciled a person must be lawfully admitted, Jerome ruled. "I do not agree that an immigrant who obtained leave to enter Canada by fraud or deception can be said to have been 'lawfully' admitted," the judge stated in a 10-page decision.

"If the entry of Mr. Nemsila into Canada in 1950 was based upon deception and misrepresentation as alleged...then it is an unlawful admission. If he was not lawfully admitted, it follows therefore that he could not have obtained 'landing' [and] if he was never landed, he never acquired Canadian domicile," Jerome stated.

Federal officials were pleased with the decision, saying it shows that "if someone gains entry to Canada by misrepresentation or deception, then they cannot rely on a passage of time as a defence," Vickery said.

The decision recognized that information about the misrepresentation may not become known until after five years had elapsed, he added.

Immigration and Justice Department officials contend that Nemsila lied about his wartime activities when he immigrated to Canada. They allege "he was a member of the [Slovak] Hlinka Guard from 1933-45 and was company commander of a unit of the alerted Hlinka Guard, which was an organization which collaborated with the German occupation forces in Slovakia in the period 1944-45."

They also allege he participated in and was responsible for the arrest, detention, interrogation and execution of civilians during the fall and winter of 1944-45 and that he served two years in custody for collaborating with the Nazis before escaping from prison.

Last week's decision, along with an earlier one denying a stay of proceedings, should provide a badly needed psychological boost and some momentum to government prosecutors trying to bring alleged war criminals to justice, say spokespersons for Canadian Jewish Congress.

Hopefully, the rulings will mean the case will now be heard on its merits and not get bogged down on technical legal issues, said Ed Morgan, counsel for Congress.

Despite Jerome's ruling, Nemsila may still avoid a hearing of the case on its merits. On Friday, lawyers for both sides will meet with Jerome. He may be asked by Jackman to certify a legal question to be heard by the Federal Court of Appeal. She might also ask for a stay of proceedings in the case pending a decision by that higher court. Vickery said government lawyers have not yet decided what their position will be should that request be made.

rules, which exempts imported products "in limited use" and unavailable in Quebec.

But last March, the OLF had stores remove some Passover goods from shelves, just as the Jewish community was stocking up, triggering an uproar at home and embarrassing Quebec officialdom around the world.

The accord spells out that the exemption will apply for 40 days before and 20 days after Passover – 68 days in all.

For its part, CJC-Q, with Montreal's kashruth supervisory body, the Vaad Ha'ir, and the Communauté Sépharade du Québec (CSQ), will keep local kosher importers and producers apprised of Quebec labelling rules for locally made and marketed kosher products, and of the accord's scope.

The Jewish organizations also agreed to use whatever powers of moral suasion they had, to see that Passover goods are not on shelves outside the 68-day period.

B'nai Brith said in a statement, that it was dropping its lawsuit to protect future kosher imports.

But it also said CJC-Q's pact with the OLF set a "dangerous precedent," by making CJC-Q "effectively a language inspector for the OLF," according to BB vice-president Jonathan Schneiderman.

The statement said, "B'nai Brith opposes in principle having a community organization commit itself to help the government enforce a law among community members, and it believes that no community organization should be asked by the government to do so."

CJC-Q director Jack Jedwab said for the record that BB's reaction was "sour grapes," since BB "in 1982 and 1986, also agreed to cooperate through arrangements strikingly similar to today."

"We made it very clear that we had no intention of being language police," said David Sultan, CJC-Q's community relations director.

"We can't force people to do things and it's not our role. But we can let them know [if goods are on shelves too early or for too long]."

Sultan described talks with the OLF as "very honest and relaxed."

They recognized they made a big error," he said. "The important thing is that from the very beginning, they agreed to the principle" of Passover goods being exempt.

1,000+ KICK-OFF UJA CAMPAIGN '97

Song, spirit, a special appearance by actor Al Waxman and over 1,000 people kicked off the 1997 UJA Federation campaign this week.

Monday's sold out Community Campaign Launch, featuring the Israeli vocal group, Shorashim, was held at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts. It was the second consecutive year in which the launch was open to the entire community and turned out to be a standing room only event.

Many of the launch participants were Campaign volunteers who had already come out for campaigner training sessions which began August 19. "Attendance has been overwhelming," said Judy Engel, who is co-chairing campaigner training with Alan Winer. "People are really responding well and the energy is just great."

The 1997 UJA Federation campaign has already raised $16 million thanks to the 8,000 donors who responded to the Three Year Vision introduced last year. They pledged for three years in order to give campaigners time to acquire new gifts.

Making new contributors feel a part of the community is crucial, according to Rosanne Ain and Gary Grundman, who are directing the new gifts effort. "We owe it to our Three Year Vision subscribers to reach out and widen the donor base," Ain added.

A Challenge Fund has been set up to match, dollar for dollar, any pledge made by a new donor. "It's a special incentive that multiplies the importance of every new gift," Campaign Chairman David Goldstein told campaigners at a recent training session.

As part of the same initiative, UJA Federation divisions and cabinets are being challenged to bring in the greatest number of new gifts. They will be publicly recognized for their work.

There's also a special outreach drive through telethons and parlour meetings to Jews living north of Steeles Avenue. "York Region has a growing Jewish community and we need to show how UJA Federation belongs to them," explained Grundman.

The success of the campaign, according to Goldstein, will not only be measured in dollars raised, but in a community saved.

"Deep government spending cuts and rising demand for assistance are threatening the survival of community programs and services," he said. "Losing them will hurt us all."

AL WAXMAN: The King goes back to his roots

by Elana Carr

Al Waxman returned to his roots this week to be the featured speaker at the 1997 UJA Federation Community Campaign Launch.

His affiliation with UJA Federation is not new. He remembers participating in Sunday morning telethons with fellow members of the Jewish entertainment industry, such as Garth Drabinsky and Moses Znaimer, in the late 60's and early 70's.

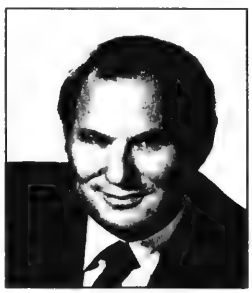
Born and raised by Polish immigrants, Waxman has never forgotten his Jewish roots. He attributes the love he feels for the community to his mother and the values she instilled in him - community involvement and tzedakah. Waxman remembers his mother teaching him that, "to belong to a community means not only to live in the community but to give to it."

After Waxman became television's "King of Kensington," requests for his volunteer time increased; whether to speak at a function or to serve on a board. He describes his usual response this way: "If I can assist for a good cause, I am always more than happy to help out." He also points out that it brings him great joy to contribute to the community in whatever way he can, through money or through time and talent.

Waxman has always maintained a balance between Jewish/Israeli causes and Canadian ones. In addition to his many commitments in the entertainment industry, such as serving as Chairman of The Canadian Academy of Cinema and Television, Waxman has been involved with many charitable organizations - among them the Canadian Cancer Society; The Heart and Stroke Foundation; Big Brothers; "Operation Go Home," a project dedicated to helping street children; The Variety Club; B'nai Brith; Hadassah-WIZO; Na'amat; ORT; Reena Foundation; State of Israel Bonds and Canadian Shaarei Tzedec Hospital Foundation. He has also hosted several Yiddish functions such as the Ashkenaz Festival.

"To be a Jew and to be a Canadian are not mutually exclusive, as far as I am concerned," says Waxman. "I feel Canada invites this from all its citizens, regardless of race, religion or cultural persuasion. To be a Jew and a Canadian are in me intertwined and to be a Jew also means being committed to the existence, security and flourishing of the State of Israel."

Waxman has always been upfront about his Jewish heritage. He recalls being asked to say grace at a reception where he and his wife were the only Jews in attendance. He informed the organizers that he could only say grace in the language of his faith. He recited the blessing over the bread in Hebrew and everyone there answered "Amen."



Al Waxman

Waxman believes that our rights in Canada cannot be taken for granted. He painfully remembers what life was like before the State of Israel was established, when Jews would feel the need to avoid drawing unnecessary attention to themselves.

"The Jews in Canada changed with the emergence and existence of the State of Israel, which gave Canadian Jews, as well as Jews all over the world, a strength and a raison d'etre, so that Jews worldwide stood proud and tall," he explains.

Waxman maintains that a crucial component of Jewish communal life is strong commitment to Israel. It was a happy coincidence that Waxman's bar mitzva took place in 1948 - the year Israel became a state.

"Canada," says Waxman, "has given me the right to free expression and Israel has given me the strength, pride and joy of being a Jew."

Mission memories live on

It was a night to remember a trip of a lifetime. The UJA Federation Mission 3000 reunion, at the Leah Posluns Theatre, allowed more than 100 mission participants to relive memories and experiences of the largest mission to Israel in Canadian history.

More than 1100 people from across Canada, 350 from Toronto, took part in the ten-day mega-mission last February, which coincided with Jerusalem 3000 celebrations.

Honey Carr, who was accompanied by her husband Jack on the mission, and Abe Glowinsky recounted trip highlights and memorable moments. "I'll never forget the uplifting feeling I had getting on the plane with hundreds of other people looking forward to the same thing," Carr said. "It's really wonderful seeing people who became like family to me," she added.

"It was a remarkable experience," said Glowinsky. "I left with a bus full of friends and came back with a plane full." Glowinsky, who chairs UJA Federation's Fashion Division, thinks it's exciting to "see people still involved in UJA Federation long after the mission."

A number of buses organized their own reunions and some have participated in UJA Federation mini-missions, visiting local agencies in Toronto. "I consider myself a UJA Federation ambassador," Glowinsky explained, "and I feel it's important for me to know what's going on in our own community."

Rosanne Ain, who co-chaired Mission 3000 with Herb Rosenfeld, was very pleased with the impact the mission had on participants. "One of our goals was to encourage people to want to get more involved with UJA Federation."

Honey and Jack Carr (above) have already been on two UJA Federation missions and are looking forward to the next Mega Mission planned for 1998.

Abe Glowinsky, (top right) had visited Israel many times but says that seeing the country while on a mission is "a whole new ball game."

Drevnig put Metulla on the map

Bill Drevnig, who died two weeks ago of a heart attack at age 83, was widely known for his business savvy. But it was what he did to help others, near and far, including his contribution to the success of Canada Centre in Metulla, for which he will be remembered.

The Dorothy and William Drevnig Olympic Ice Skating Arena has helped make the Centre in Israel's northernmost community one of the country's most popular recreation facilities.

Drevnig, who was founder and CEO of the Pennington's women's clothing chain, until retiring in 1988, went from rags to riches. "He began as a dress salesman and ended up running one of the largest women's clothing retailers in Canada and the U.S.," recalls son-in-law Jeffrey Lyons. During the 80's, Drevnig owned 168 stores in Canada and 22 in the U.S.

"He was married to his business," explains Lyons, "but he was always willing to help friends, family and even strangers." Drevnig was widely known for hiring people down on their luck and maintaining employees who had already reached retirement age.

Drevnig, always busy expanding and improving his business, never forgot about those less fortunate. "He supported many charities but never wanted to be publicly recognized for his generosity," remembers Lyons.

"Each week he would meet with his secretary and go over the requests for help he received from the various organizations," explains Drevnig's wife Dorothy. Mount Sinai Hospital, Baycrest and Technion University are just a few of the many causes he supported.

"He was quietly committed," adds Donald Carr, who worked with the Drevnigs on the couple's $1 million contribution to Canada Centre, built with funds raised by UJA Federation and allocated through United Israel Appeal.

"He called me one day," Carr recalls, "and told me he wanted to make a major contribution to Israel."

The Dorothy and William Drevnig Arena, which serves thousands of people in Israel and in Lebanon, was where Israeli Olympic skater Misha Shmerkin, who placed second in the 1996 Skate Canada competition, trained.

"Bill's decision to become involved in this particular project exemplifies his vision and his understanding of the needs of the people living in that part of Israel," observes Dr. Gerry Halbert, Immediate Past President of UIA Canada.

Due to his illness, Drevnig was unable to attend the opening of the arena, although his wife was there, accompanied by other family members. Metulla's Mayor, Yossi Goldberg, came to visit Drevnig in Toronto last fall to update him on the project.

Dorothy and Bill Drevnig (centre) presented a cheque for the Canada Centre Arena to UIA Immediate Past President Dr. Gerry Halbert in 1994.

Community Partners

Building community

Howard Sokolowski and Peter Ekstein, co-chairs of the UJA Federation Construction Cabinet are building for the community's future. They're building what they consider one of the best campaign teams the Construction Cabinet has ever seen.

Sokolowski, who owns Tribute Homes, only became involved as a volunteer with UJA Federation last year, although he is a long-time Campaign supporter. "I find my volunteer work much more satisfying than just writing a cheque," says Sokolowski, who grew up spending summers at the Bathurst "Y" and attending Jewish camps.

Having had first hand experiences with UJA Federation funded agencies such as Reena, Sokolowski says he's been "sensitized to the importance of maintaining our community's unrivalled infrastructure."

His role in this year's Campaign is clear. "I want to bring a greater sense of awareness about UJA Federation and what it does for the community, to the construction industry."

Peter Ekstein, part owner of Weston Forest Co, began his UJA Federation volunteer career as a campaigner at Super Sunday 1992. "My mother was a Holocaust survivor brought to Canada by Jewish Immigrant Aid Service," explains Ekstein, "and she taught me about my responsibility to give back to the community."

He made his first visit to Israel at age 16 and immediately fell in love with the country. "I felt completely at home," says Ekstein, who now travels to Israel two or three times a year for his lumber export business. "It's a great way to see Israel more often."

Ekstein says he has high expectations for the Construction Cabinet based on the number of new people getting involved. "People are starting to recognize the need out there and making it their responsibility."

Fishing in hot water

Fish ponds in the desert? Only a few years ago this would have been considered science fiction. Yet today, pisciculture is a thriving business in the Negev desert thanks to special research and technology carried out and developed by the UJA Federation funded Jewish Agency for Israel.

Some 80 tons of St. Peter's fish, white bass, carp and mullet are harvested annually from pools at Moshav Kadesh Barnea. In addition, the water from the ponds is recycled for use in irrigating greenhouse fruits and vegetables.

The story began 15 years ago. While drilling for sweet water near the moshav, which is located in the Negev highlands on the border with the Egyptian Sinai, a government expedition hit upon large quantities of warm, brackish water.

The Negev/Arava R&D Station, which was set up about the same time to research and develop unique solutions to the agricultural problems of the region, decided it would be a crime not to put this hydrological bounty to use.

The Station had acquired the necessary knowledge for raising fish but didn't have successful experience in growing plants in hot water. The Kadesh Barnea growers turned out to be a stubborn lot and it was decided to go ahead on both fronts. About six years ago, a pilot project was established with the backing of JAFI's Negev/Arava R&D Project. Some 60 dunams of land were set aside for fish ponds and greenhouse cherry tomatoes.

The project proved to be a bigger success than was anticipated and has since become a commercial enterprise.

Due to the area's unique climatic conditions, the fish ponds yield 64 times that of similar ponds located in the north of Israel. And the "Desert Sweet" tomatoes, grown with recycled water from the ponds, have high quality and superb taste.

Twenty moshav families now operate hothouses on 100 dunams of land growing "Desert Sweet" cherry tomatoes irrigated by water from the ponds.

Dear Friends:

How many times have you asked someone to accept an idea, only to be told "show me and I'll believe it"?

Nearly 80 years ago, our Jewish community had an idea - to unite a chaotic collection of charitable organizations into one cohesive Federation. We harnessed our collective compassion and translated our beliefs into action. The results show.

Our Jewish community is among the world's most admired. We believe in helping each other, in extending our hand to every Jew who requires our support. We've built one of the world's best Jewish education systems and an outstanding network of programs and services on which our community so strongly relies.

Year after year, decade after decade, we've lived by our beliefs. The community has enabled UJA Federation to benefit millions, whether it is financially assisting our Jewish poor, helping children whose parents cannot afford full tuition to attend a Jewish day school or rescuing Jews from the world's war scarred regions.

Today, government budget cuts threaten the survival of our community's services and programs. Losing them will weaken all of us. UJA Federation is the means to maintain them.

Since Jews started settling in Toronto, compassion, commitment to each other and concern for fellow Jews everywhere have been our community's cornerstones. We believe in Jewish values. UJA Federation embodies those values and the beliefs that have built this remarkable community.

As a community, we have an obligation to preserve and strengthen what we have. We believe that, by working together, we can create a better Jewish world. For our community. For Israel. For our children. Forever.

Quebec museum removes Hitler's portrait after protests

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A portrait of Adolf Hitler has been removed from a collection of Quebec folk art at the Canadian Museum of Civilization in Hull, Quebec, following complaints from a Toronto-area doctor and others.

News of its removal was conveyed to Dr. Warren Goldstein, a Thornhill neurologist, by Arthur C. Eggleton, minister of International Trade and MP for York Centre.

"I was shocked to find a large portrait of Hitler when I visited the museum with my wife, Janice Rotman, and three children," Goldstein said. "We were having a wonderful time up to that point, particularly because there are so many hands-on things for the children."

Goldstein left a comment form at the museum's desk, objecting to the portrait, and three months later received a letter from Mauro Peressini on behalf of the museum, defending its inclusion in the exhibit.

Peressini said it was an example of genuine folk art by Ernest Gendron and was representative of how artists reflect people in the media. Gendron's body of work includes portraits of President John F. Kennedy, Charlie Chaplin, Marilyn Monroe, Olivier Guimond and René Lévesque, he wrote.

Though he did not offer to remove the portrait, Peressini wrote: "I fully agree with you that Hitler was one of the most dangerous creatures of this century." However, he said, it was not right "to sweep such horrible subjects under the carpet."

Nonplussed by this reply to his objection, on April 26 Goldstein wrote to Eggleton, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, Minister for Veterans Affairs David Collenette and Minister for Canadian Heritage Sheila Copps.

A letter from Eggleton's office dated July 5 said that though the Quebec Folk Art exhibit would continue for another six to 12 months, the Hitler portrait would be removed.

a fall trip to Washington, for which Rabbi Benjie Jacoby, an observer at the meeting, promised office space at Jewish Education Program (JEP) and a budget for long-distance phone calls.

Turack said she supports the group and is there to help, but she isn't convinced that it will differ substantively from anything existing.

The CJC-run annual Council of University Presidents (CUP) conference is one example of the community addressing leadership development in small communities. However, as Young pointed out, there is no actual "CUP."

Kol Hastudentim members intend to make use of existing structures like the conference while maintaining their independence.

"I have no problem with the idea of it being student-run," said Turack, whose predecessor, Susan Jackson, was instrumental in fostering Jewish activity in small communities. As an ex-Networker, Turack differentiates Kol Hastudentim from its organizational predecessor by noting that "this group is clearly not anti-establishment."

Ali Rosenbaum and Ian Dworkin of Trent University in Peterborough said that Kol Hastudentim is necessary for communication between Jewish student groups within the province.

"This is my fifth year at Trent, and there was a real gap," said Dworkin.

The Jewish "establishment" recognizes that gap. "We're trying to respond to what the local communities are saying to us," Cohen said. He has been working for months on designing RISE (Regional Interstudent Exchange), a program to offer resources and create connectedness via computer.

"We're spending more money [on RISE and other vehicles to support students] than the money that was cut from Network — significantly more," Cohen said.

Liberals consider when to call federal election

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX

OTTAWA — Parliament is coming back later this month from its summer recess for what will likely be the last session before the next federal election. Canadians are expected to go to the polls next spring at the earliest or next fall at the latest.

If it was only up to Prime Minister Jean Chretien, we'd probably be in an election campaign right now. All summer long Chretien has been pressuring the Liberal party back room boys to allow him to call a snap election this fall.

And all summer they kept telling him "Forget it Jean, the time isn't right." They remember Ontario Liberal premier David Peterson who called the provincial election nobody wanted and paid the ultimate political price for it at the polls.

Chretien's strategy in a fall election would have been to capitalize on the relatively low-profile of Bloc Quebecois leader Michel Gauthier (hoping of course that Premier Lucien Bouchard wouldn't campaign on his behalf) to win half a dozen more seats in Quebec, or failing that, let Jean Charest's federalist Tories take that many Quebec seats. Either way the idea would be to diminish the strength of the Bloc in the Commons in the run-up to the next Quebec referendum.

Couple that with whatever the Tories and New Democrats could win back in the rest of Canada, even if some of it were at the expense of the Liberals, and Chretien would consider himself in a good position for the upcoming referendum and for the next four years in Ottawa.

Few people noticed over the summer, apart from political insiders and the professional pollsters, but it became a four-way horse-race for second place in federal politics.

Four political parties: the Bloc Quebecois, the Reform party, the Conservative party and the New Democrats (NDP) are all sandwiched in between 10 and 15 percent in popularity in the polls.

Reform has been in steady decline

The Bloc with its regional base, has the least possibility for growth; Reform has been in a slow, steady decline in popularity since the last election; the Tories keep growing steadily as the party heals its wounds from the past; and the New Democrats, to everyone's surprise, sneaked up quietly from single digits to join the others during the summer.

The situation couldn't be any better for the Liberals. A distant dead-heat for second virtually assures them re-election. No wonder Chretien was so eager to go to the polls this fall.

The Liberals are far from invincible. They still haven't come in with a coherent national unity strategy in the buildup to the next Quebec referendum. Everybody in Canada knows it.

Every indication coming out of Ottawa has been that the Liberals don't have a clue what to do about Quebec, and the closest thing to a strategy they have so far is a plan to call a federal election before Bouchard can call his provincial election. That's not very much.

Suddenly this summer the Reformers came out in favor of tax reductions, just like the Republicans in the United States. These are the same Reformers who for the past three years kept repeating "no tax reductions until the deficit is brought under control."

They are still in favor of deficit reduction, only they are not in so much of a hurry anymore.

The Bloc now realizes that they will, or die at the whim of Bouchard. If he decides he doesn't need Bloc MPs in Ottawa any more, all he has to do is not campaign actively and the party will fold back into the Parti Quebecois.

The NDP is the most unexpected surprise. The new leader Alexa McDonough has hardly made a major impact, and the party is still groping to find new meaningful policies in the age of greed and globalization. Apart from the right-wing drift of the governing Liberals it is hard to explain the NDP's comeback in popularity.

The biggest political surprise of the summer has to be Charest who has definite charismatic appeal in Quebec and could carry the torch for federalism in the next referendum if only the Liberals were magnanimous (or sacred) enough to let him.

Charest's major problem is getting the rest of the country to forget that Brian Mulroney was a Conservative. That's why Charest keeps making the distinction every time he can: "The Conservative government was defeated, the Conservative party was not." Sometimes it works, sometimes it does not.

With all the jockeying for position going into the next election, it promises to be a lively, partisan and hot political fall.

Montreal camp suing former employee

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — One of Montreal's best-known Jewish camps, Camp Massad, is suing a former employee and her now-estranged husband, after $150,000 went missing from the camp between June 1989 and March 1995, according to public court records obtained by The CJN.

On May 2, Superior Court Judge John Bishop upheld a motion by the lawyers for Eleanor Diner, the camp's former paid administrative secretary and one of the defendants in the case, to overturn the seizure of her Cote St. Luc home, which took place in August 1995.

A civil trial against the couple is pending, and at writing no criminal charges had been sought against either of the Diners.

The court upheld the defence motion because, it said, a prima facie case has not yet been established that Eleanor Diner either acted fraudulently, profited by the fraud, knew of it before March 1995, or that the camp's claim against her would be jeopardized without the seizure.

However, in his ruling, Bishop said that over a six-year period, Eleanor's husband Melvin, a textile salesman and "compulsive gambler," "defrauded the camp of amounts in excess of $150,000 by preparing camp cheques to pay non-existent claims," obtaining the signatures of camp officers for the cheques "on the basis of false representation," increasing the amounts on some cheques and forging payee endorsements on 27 of 74 cheques involved in the case.

According to court records, the fraud was discovered accidentally in March 1995 and the couple separated shortly afterward.

"Mr. Diner first denied and then admitted his responsibility for the fraud," Bishop writes, with the funds obtained used "for gambling losses."

"The validity of the camp's claim against Mr. Diner is not contested at this stage [before a civil trial]."

Eleanor Diner's degree of liability, if any, however, is less clear.

A teacher, she worked for the camp part time out of her home. Her duties included processing cheques and being one of the camp's signing officers.

But according to the court records, she says she entrusted her husband with several of her duties — including preparing camp cheques for signing.

Virtually all of the bogus cheques were for camp "maintenance work."

The camp is contending that Eleanor Diner should be held liable because she either did know or should have known about the fraud and because her husband, who received no salary, acted as her "agent," rather than the camp's. The latter point, in particular, could determine during a civil trial whether she is ultimately held liable for any of the money embezzled.

The court ruled that there is no prima facie basis yet established for the camp's claims against Mrs. Diner.

In his ruling, Bishop said Eleanor Diner claims that her husband kept her in the dark about his financial situation, gambling losses and fraudulent activities, and that she signed all the cheques in blind faith.

"The proof does not yet show that Mrs. Diner deliberately chose to ignore facts [as the camp alleges] about her husband which should have given her cause for concern," the court said.

"It indicates instead that she allowed him to assume full responsibility for certain camp work and, because of her trust in him, did not herself verify the circumstances surrounding the bogus cheques."

Bishop's ruling also raised serious questions about the camp's internal operations.

The camp's former auditor, David Finestone, who died in 1987, "failed to notice the large number of cheques endorsed and deposited to Mr. Diner's account, [or] the substantial increase in maintenance expenses."

Camp officials even failed to notice the names of fictitious payees and forged signatures of the camp's own officers on a few of the cheques.

Lawyers for the camp and the Diners, as well as camp president Irving Ludmer, declined to comment on the case before it is resolved.

Winnipeg group home vandalized

By MATT BELLAN
The Jewish Post & News

WINNIPEG – David Wilder had a disturbing experience when he showed up for work as a counsellor at the Chevrah Group Home last Aug. 9.

Anti-Semitic graffiti covered the front door and part of the Tyndallstone facing on the 427 Templeton Ave. residence for adolescents "in transition."

The bright red graffiti included a Star of David with a big "x" over it, two inaccurately drawn swastikas, and the words "F- yoy" below a stickman hanging from a noose.

Wilder recalled that morning that he alerted Winston Duncan, a live-in counsellor at the Jewish Child and Family Service run home who'd spent the night there. Touring the outside of the residence, they came across Duncan's Isuzu Impulse, a 1990 red hatchback in the driveway.

"He said, 'I don't have tinted windows,'" Wilder remembered. Opening a car door, they saw what looked like extensive fire damage.

Much of the interior and the entire inside roof of the car was covered with black soot. Large parts of the back seat upholstery and part of the front upholstery appeared to have melted away, exposing the foam rubber padding. And the inside windows were covered in an opaque, smoky film.

The spraypainting and attack on the car, which the staff members said happened in the early hours of that morning, were the most violent assaults with anti-Semitic overtones in recent Jewish community history.

"I felt very offended that that would happen here," Wilder said of his initial reaction. "It felt like a violation." Duncan expressed shock. "It's the kind of stuff you read about in the newspaper," he said. "But you don't see it in your car in your driveway over night."

Wilder said he couldn't "begin to speculate" about what caused the damage to Duncan's car. Someone could have "just doused it with gasoline and lit it," he mused. Or "it could have been some kind of cherry bomb."

He also noted that a Jewish Child and Family Service (JCFS) van sitting in front of Duncan's car in the driveway was left untouched, and that Duncan had left one of his car windows open overnight.

"My guess is it was more an act of convenience," Wilder said of the attack on the Chevrah counselor's car.

Wilder also expressed annoyance at how long it took the police to respond to his report of the incident.

"I called the police at 8:30 a.m.," he said. It was now nearly 11 a.m. and no police had shown up. "They weren't planning on showing up," Wilder claimed. "It was going to be a report over the phone. I told them it was anti-Semitic material, and they became a bit more interested."

David Wilder stands next to anti-Semitic graffiti he discovered on front entrance to Chevrah Group Home.

Wilder contended that police arriving earlier could have scanned the area for the can used in the graffiti spraypainting, or checked Duncan's car for fingerprints.

Barney Yellen, executive director of Jewish Child and Family Service, also said he was "shocked and upset" about the spraypainting and the attack on Duncan's car.

The Chevrah Home houses older preteens and teenagers with a variety of emotional problems, and some have been in trouble with the law over the years.

"Destructive behavior is part of the lifestyle of these children," he said. But the home has been open since 1967, Yellen added; some residents have sometimes caused damage inside, but there has never been the kind of vandalism on the outside that happened Aug. 9.

Yellen declined to speculate on whether any current or recent residents might be linked to the attacks.

"Whoever did it was obviously extremely angry," he said. "The sentiments were very clear, and clearly anti-Semitic."

Sentiments clearly anti-Semitic

Whether that represents the anger of a "disturbed child" or a "hate group, I have no idea."

Yellen confirmed that all four of the current residents are non-Jewish. Asked what percentage of Jewish residents the home has over a given year, he said that varies. "Three of four were Jewish at one point in the year," he added. Overall, though, the number of Jewish residents is "less than 25 per cent."

Asked why JCFS has to administer a home for troubled adolescents when so few are Jewish, Yellen maintained it's "a very Jewish thing" to provide services to the larger community.

He added that it's important to have a Jewishly run facility for Jewish teenagers "when it's demanded."

As for security of residents and staff following the Aug. 9 incidents, Yellen acknowledged that the home has no "exterior alarm" or other devices to detect an outside prowler. He added, however, that the JCFS and Chevrah Home staff are "always as careful as we can be."

Quiet residential neighborhood

Sophie Tapper, executive director of B'nai Brith Canada's Midwest Region, showed up at the home Aug. 9 to photograph the spraypainting and the damage to Duncan's car, and file a report to her organization's Toronto headquarters.

She said later that day she considered the incidents "very serious.

This is a home where there are children."

Tapper noted that the Chevrah Home is in a "quiet residential neighborhood," but that it's not far from the Lubavitch Centre and Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, which also experienced anti-Semitic vandalism in the past few years.

She acknowledged, however, that she's never seen violence like the burning of the interior of Duncan's car.

Tapper also expressed surprise that even by late morning, police hadn't shown up to document the incidents.

"I know they're busy, but a police photographer could have come down, and certainly somebody to interview the staff."

She acknowledged, however, that she didn't know what police "priorities" are, and whether police arriving a few hours earlier would have made much difference.

Members of the Winnipeg police force's Hate Crimes Unit were off duty last weekend, and couldn't be reached for comment.

Sargeant Harry Bakema of Police District #13 on Hartford Avenue, said in the late afternoon on Aug. 9 that police would look into the incidents "immediately," and try and determine who might be responsible. He also declined to speculate on who might have been responsible, saying the report would be passed on to the police Hate Crimes Unit, and they will "draw conclusions."

Asked why police didn't show up until 12:21 p.m. to investigate the incidents, which Chevra Home worker David Wilder said he reported to them nearly four hours earlier, Bakema said that in early morning, the police have a "huge backlog" of cases.

He disputed Wilder's claim that the staff sargeant on duty initially wanted to only take a report over the phone.

"They would want someone to look at the damage, especially if there was damage to a car," Bakema contended.

He said police woudn't take the spraypainting and the attack on a staff member's car lightly. "We'll be looking into it immediately to find out what the situation has been, and who might be responsible."

Wrestlers show mettle — but win no medals

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Two Montreal Jewish wrestlers may have come home from the Olympic Games in Atlanta without any medals, but it was not for lack of showing mettle.

Maccabiah and previous Olympic veteran Andy Borodow, a super-heavyweight (130-kilogram) contender who finished 16th overall, said the results had a lot to do with the luck — or the bad luck — of the random draw.

Borodow, 26, had to face American team flag-bearer Bruce Baumgartner in his first freestyle match. And Baumgartner, a true legend, was maybe the toughest opponent in the field.

Borodow did very well in his second match, beating a Kirghizstanian opponent 5-3, but was ousted from medal contention and from further competition in a tight, third round 1-0 loss to a Greek wrestler from the former Soviet republic of Georgia.

Oleg Ladik, a top heavyweight Russian import competing at his first Olympics, did better, finishing eighth overall, and got a better draw, winning his first match against an Albanian opponent.

Ladik, 25, lost his second match to a Pole — this year's European champion — but won his third round by default when a top Russian freestyler forfeited. He then lost his next two matches to Ukrainian competitors.

Their overall results, said their coach from the Montreal Wrestling Club, Victor Zilberman, was indeed influenced by the draw, as well as by an overall higher calibre of performance from other countries benefitting from the break-up of the Soviet bloc.

Many of the former U.S.S.R.'s top coaches and wrestlers have lent their expertise to a new generation of wrestlers in other countries.

Still, Zilberman, who guided a non-Jewish Canadian wrestler, Guivi Sissaouri, to a silver medal, says the draw isn't everything.

"Whatever the draw, you still have to win," he said.

Zilberman thinks Borodow and Ladik did the best they could, but sometimes that's just not enough.

The Olympics are the Olympics and they can produce nervousness and a "flat" performance, something he said he saw in Ladik at the Atlanta Games.

Despite his very respectable showing, Ladik said he hopes to do better four years from now in Australia.

"It was a tough draw in a tough weight class [100-kg], with over 20 wrestlers," he said.

"I'm disappointed, but I just have to take the time to improve some technical matters."

Borodow, too, plans to be in Sydney.

He thinks he also could have finished among the top eight, had he gotten a better draw and beaten his Greek opponent, whom he said should have been penalized for evasive moves that may have been illegal.

"My draw was the worst case you could have had," Borodow said. But it's all part of the game."

Borodow has also been trying to deal with some painful bone spurs in his right ankle, although he said they did not bother him in Atlanta and did not hurt his performance.

Ironically, Zilberman said that the way the Olympic matches are structured, the odds of finishing among the top 10 are higher with a first-round loss.

Once a first round is lost, the best hope is for a bronze medal, but even that would require winning the next five matches.

Maccabi recruiting master athletes

TORONTO — If you're an athlete who's slightly past his or her prime but still loves the adrenalin rush of competition, there's no need to fret.

Next summer's 15th Maccabiah Games, which run from July 14 to 24 in Israel, offers "master sports competition" in a variety of disciplines.

Athletes with a little bit of seasoning can compete in golf, squash, swimming, tennis, track and field, triathlon, basketball and soccer.

The master events run parallel to the open and junior competitions. There's also a round of events for physically challenged athletes at the quadrennial games, held the year after the Olympics.

Masters athletes are defined by age and, judging by the costs involved, the depths of their pocketbooks.

The youngest age category for master athletes begins at 35 for squash, tennis and soccer, while 40-year-olds are the youngsters in events like basketball, track and field and swimming.

Master competition is self-funded by the athletes and costs run around $5,000 per athlete. Unlike previous years, the Maccabi organization will not subsidize master athletes.

Canada expects to send at least 25 master athletes to the games and their families are encouraged to come along to share in the unique experience of participating in an event that brings together Jews from around the world.

An estimated 5,600 athletes from more than 50 countries, including 250 from Canada, are expected to participate in next summer's games.

Victor Salem, Maccabi Canada's national masters chair, said "other countries have seen that master athletes come back as valuable ambassadors-at-large for their Maccabi organizations."

"In several other countries, it has helped to bring people into their organizations, developing new leadership and enabling other people to go," added Roy Salomon, president of Maccabi Canada.

We need each other

Whether we like to admit it or not, community is a precious commodity. Why else would so many people, no matter how long they backpacked through Europe, climbed mountains in Nepal or lived in splendid isolation in a downtown loft, eventually settle near others very much like themselves.

How much more true this is for Jews.

On the most superficial level, we cluster with other Jews so that we can have the Jewish stores, synagogues institutions and schools that we need in order to live a fully Jewish life. It is no accident that as Jews have moved from Kensington, to Bathurst Street, and now north to Thornhill, those amenities have moved along with us.

But there is a more gut-wrenching reason to maintain a Jewish community. Simply put, we don't only need Jewish "things," we need other Jews.

Editorial

In earlier times and in other lands, it was for comfort in times of illness, grinding poverty or pogroms. How inexpressibly lonely, how much more terrifying it would have been to face these hardships without others who understood. After all, they had gone through it all too.

Jews in Canada, especially in places like the Greater Toronto Area, tend to have the same problems as the general population: dealing with government cutbacks in social services, an aging population, a sense of an alienated and sometimes flundering youth.

Yet who will forget that night in November when thousands of us made our way to a North York hall to memorialize an assassinated Israeli prime minister. We were not then divided into religious and non-religious, wealthy and poor, men and women, young and old. We were one family, huddling together for warmth, and some sense that hope was not lost.

At happy times, too, we seek each other out — for a new baby, a wedding, a bar or bat mitzvah, a new house. These celebrations, we feel, are not our families' alone, but are made sweeter by sharing them with others.

It is during the ordinary, routine days that we forget how much we need each other and the Jewish community as a whole. We forget that the community cannot exist except as a union of each one of us, and that we have a responsibility to that union. This supplement, as always, celebrates those who live up to that responsibility. Yeshar koach.

Toronto's really a diverse place

By SIDURA LUDWIG
CJN Staff

I was on the bus a few weeks ago with my 7-year-old sister, when she was in Toronto to visit. An East Indian couple got on and stood in front of us, speaking their own language.

My sister turned to me and said, "There's something I've noticed about Toronto."

"What's that?"

"Everyone speaks a different language."

I explained that no, not everyone, but that many people come here from different countries.

"Oh," she said. "Then I guess this is a place that really brings people together."

When I first moved here two years ago from Winnipeg, I felt the same way about Toronto. I wanted to live in a place full of diversity and choice. And not just in the general community, but in the Jewish community especially. I believed that a city the size of Toronto would have something for every Jew and that I could find my place here.

Now that I'm settled, I've discovered that diversity isn't al ways desirable and choice can be limiting.

I'll say what I do love. I love going into a restaurant and knowing I can order anything on the menu. I love having a selection of kosher restaurants to choose from, including one on my own university's (York University) campus. I love going into a major supermarket and having aisles of kosher food, never feeling limited.

I also love the abundance of Jewish activities going on at any given time. Whether a Klezmer festival, a Purim seudah, a Jewish book fair, a feminist seder – in almost any month, there are a number of programs to participate in. Nobody can deny that Toronto is a Jewish friendly city.

But the downside I have found with all this choice, is the lack of communal mishpachah.

I'm very involved with the Jewish Students' Federation (JSF) at York. Because of my involvement, I have often listened to complaints about the way the organization serves the Jewish student population. The two most common complaints I've encountered are: The JSF is too religious; and the JSF is not religious enough.

There doesn't seem to be a common ground here for all Jews. With the greatness of this city, the large Jewish population becomes so overwhelming that it breaks off into smaller communities. So we get active Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and other branches; but when we try and develop an organization to cater to us all, we find ourselves stretching beyond our limits.

I would never say that a smaller community can offer choice for all Jews. In my experience, a smaller community is mainly made up of one branch of Judaism. But the result is a togetherness, a communal strength that is not found with a larger population. The people in the smaller communities share common concerns, values and visions.

In our larger community, each sub-community has its concerns, values and visions, but as a whole, they often seem to conflict.

I have been asked many times whether I see myself living in Toronto after I graduate. And while I've lately been answering that I miss my family and would like to go home, I am at a toss up. If I go home, I'll be giving up my choice. I'll be giving up the enjoyment I get from walking in the Bathurst/Clark area Shabbat evening and hardly seeing any cars. I'll be giving up the opportunity to learn more about Judaism by having friends who have different ways of practising religious observance.

But there's little that can rival working in my neighborhood bookstore and knowing that every day someone I know will walk in. There's little that can rival the pride that comes with sharing in a community member's accomplishment, with the added nachas of knowing him or her.

I agree with my sister. This is a place that brings people together. But that feeling of togetherness is limited.

From Albania to Zaïre

ORT trains people to help themselves - and then to help others. Following the Jewish mandate of Tzedaka, concern for the whole of humanity, ORT began to share its experience in education and training with people in the developing world in 1960. Today, ORT is the world's largest non-governmental education and training organization. Our pioneering projects are to be found wherever the need is urgent. They enhance the living standards of people in some of the world's most disadvantaged areas, offering new and marketable skills, which lead to independence and dignity. For example, ORT introduces farmers to modern agricultural techniques, provides training in transport, mining, industry, hotel management, electronics and much more. And when it comes to computer literacy and Information Technology, ORT is truly a world leader. A few examples of ORT's current International Co-operation projects: Albania: 12,000 prisoners trained in new skills which range from Tour-ism to Micro-Enterprise Develop-ment. Croatia: Displaced persons and refugees from Bosnia trained in home construction, tailoring, computing and English. Peru: 6,000 impoverished pre-school Indian children and their mothers cared for and trained in Mother and Child Care projects in the squatter camps outside Lima. Philippines: 100,000 people benefitting from primary health care, nutrition, pre-school education and community development projects following the 1990 Mt. Pina Tubo earthquake. All these projects are run in partnership with local people and all are funded by bilateral and multilateral aid agencies. N.B. World ORT Union still depends on the financial support of its member national organizations, such as ORT Canada, foundations and private individuals to sustain its traditional programmes in Israel and in Jewish communities around the world. Find out how you can help ORT make a world of difference. Contact us at: ORT Canada, 3101 Bathurst Street, Suite 604, Toronto, Ont. M6A 2A6. Tel: (416) 787-0339, Fax: (416) 787-9420

Jewish facilities expand to meet growing needs

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

As the Jewish community in and around the Toronto area continues to grow in size, numerous facilities are expanding and new ones are being organized to meet the religious and spiritual needs of the community.

The diversity of the Jewish community is reflected in the numerous synagogues, temples, educational facilities, religious groups and organizations that serve the needs of the many segments of Judaism, from the acculturated to the most pious, as well as humanist, egalitarian, secularist, reconstructionist, gays and lesbians, and others with special needs.

A walk on Bathurst Street presents a panorama of cultural and religious variations. Religious facilities are moving northward and a new vibrancy has become evident in the revitalized downtown core. There are well over 100 synagogues and temples in the Greater Toronto Area.

To accommodate the needs in the community, there are a growing number of Hebrew educational facilities, organized kashrut supervision, social service agencies, mikvot, burial and cemeteries and facilities for the elderly.

Lifestyle changes have brought with them newly developed programs and practices which have been undertaken by synagogues, temples and social agencies. And new and exciting groups have been formed to meet the needs of Jews who have settled in Toronto from around the world — Sephardi, Russian, Hungarian, Indian and Iraqi.

Jewish Information Service (JIS) collects and dispenses information about Jewish services, programs, synagogues and temples, cultural/social/singles groups and activities, accommodation, holidays and festivals, camps and much more.

Recently, JIS circulated a list with a roster of synagogues and temples in the area which have extra seating for the High Holy Days.

Along with services at synagogues and temples, some of the locations where services will be held include, the Hebrew schools, public schools, community centres, Earl Bales Park, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, National Council of Jewish Women, Garnet A. Williams Centre, Bloor JCC, Leah Posluns Theatre and even at a Shriners temple.

There will be signed services for the deaf at the North York Community Hall, student services will be held by the Jewish Student Federation at York University and services will be conducted at the Ontario Institute for Studies and Education.

The policy of the Reform temples is that friends of family or relatives from out of town may acquire tickets. All Reform congregations in North America have reciprocal arrangements whereby members from an out of town temple may attend services free at a temple in another city. A letter is required from the home congregation.

Services in many synagogues and temples are for members only. There is an extensive list of congregations with available accommodation for a fee of $25 to $115 for an adult ticket and special rates for students and children. There are also synagogues that provide subsidies.

JIS lists several Orthodox services that have seats available at no charge — Knesseth Israel, off Runnymede, one block north of Dundas, Minyan Avreichim (The Boat Shul) on Bathurst Street, Ner Israel Yeshiva on Bathurst Street, and Koil Yankov Anshe Emes on Brunswick Avenue (that notes that donations are optional).

The major rabbinic organizations in the area are the Reform Rabbis of Greater Toronto, the Vaad Harabonim (Orthodox Rabbinical Council), which is a body of Orthodox rabbis throughout Ontario, excluding Ottawa, the Rabbinical Assembly, Ontario region (Conservative rabbis), the Union of Traditional Conservative Judaism — a coalition of Conservative "right-wing" rabbis and the Toronto Board of Rabbis.

According to the statistics recently released by JIS, more than a dozen synagogues and temples have increased their membership over the past year. The First Narayever Synagogue on Brunswick Avenue, an egalitarian traditional congregation, had the greatest increase in membership.

Some new listings of religious services includes, Aish Hatorah Learning Centre, Dan Family Learning Centre on Clark Avenue in Thornhill, the Associated Hebrew Day School Synagogue on Atkinson Avenue in Thornhill, Hachal Yisroel (Sephardi) on Bathurst Street, Khal Toras Chesed on Lawrence Avenue, Shivter Yisroel on Finch Avenue West, Tifereth Yaakov Congregation on Bathurst Street, and the Uptown Shul on Bathurst Street. These are all Orthodox congregations or minyanim.

There are more than 10 mikvot (ritual baths) located throughout the city. The newest listing is Kollel Avreichim Mikvah on Coldstream Avenue. The mikvah is used by Jews who follow the laws of taharat hamishpachah (family purity). Immersion in a mikvah is also part of the conversion process.

The Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth — COR — the Kashruth Council of Toronto which supervises synagogues, thousands of retail and commercial products, kashrut services, hotels and catering establishments also provides an educational program, a cooking school and a kosher information service which is open to the entire community.

Brit milah (ritual circumcision) is performed by 13 mohelim.

Cemeteries are spread throughout the area and there are four facilities where you can make funeral arrangements: Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel, Hebrew Basic Burial, Simple Alternative and Steeles-College Memorial Chapel.

For those who spend time away from the city, seasonal religious services are held in Muskoka, Orillia, two locations in Wasaga Beach, two in the Belle Ewart-Tent City area, in Jackson Point, as well as Barrie, Ajax, Bramalea, Newmarket, Oakville, Mississauga and other smaller communities.

For more information on the religious and educational facilities available in and around Toronto, call the Jewish Information Service 416-635-5600, fax 416-631-5715 or the UJA/Federation Web site [http://www.feduja. org].

COMMUNITY FOCUS

Lipa Green's a hub for Jewish services

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Browse through the directory of the Lipa Green Building on Bathurst just north of Sheppard and you get a quick overview of Toronto's Jewish community. As the home to many Jewish communal agencies, a major part of what happens in the community happens right there.

How would the Jewish community function without the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, the central agency for Toronto's Jewish communal life? Among its functions, the federation allocates funds raised by United Jewish Appeal in Toronto to such agencies as Jewish Family & Child Service Jewish Vocational Service, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services and Jewish Information Service, many of whom have offices in the Lipa Green Building. As well, the federation identifies needs for social, cultural and education services in Toronto and surrounding areas.

Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, was established in 1934 in order to address the concerns of central Canadian Jews. The agency operates through various committees including the Israel affairs committee that serves as a vehicle for education, information and advocacy as well as community mobilization on matters concerning Israel and Israel affairs. Other committees include education and culture and joint community relations.

The Ontario Jewish Archives, a joint department of Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, is responsible for collecting and preserving documents reflecting Jewish history in the province. Its holdings include minutes and other records of Jewish organizations, personal papers, newspapers, photographs and some artifacts.

Treasure trove of books, magazines

The Albert J. Latner Jewish Public Library is a treasure trove of books, magazines, periodicals and reference material on all aspects of Jewish life, in English, Yiddish and Hebrew. Included in the library is a large children's section, all standard resource books and a number of rare volumes.

The Board of Jewish Education is the central agency for Jewish education, serving day schools and supplementary schools in the Toronto area. It maintains a media centre, teacher creativity centre, and an information bank related to Jewish education. Its services include recruitment and placement of qualified teachers, consultation and school visits and administration of the Toronto Jewish Teachers' Seminary. It also oversees the distribution of federation funds to schools to support needy students.

The Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre is committed to the advancement of public awareness of the Holocaust. It offers visitors a view of Jewish life in pre-Nazi Europe and a slide persentation. In the Hall of Memories, the names of Holocaust victims are inscribed in ceramic tiles lining the walls.

Toronto Jews know there is somewhere to turn in time of need. For financial aid, they may be eligible for a small interest-free loan from Toronto Jewish Free Loan Casa G'milath Chasodim Association that has assisted the Jewish community since 1924. Loans may be provided for personal, education and business needs.

Jewish Family & Child Service offers a broad range of services to meet the social and emotional needs of the Jewish community. Its services include individual, marital and family counselling, financial assistance, family violence services, group therapy and information and referral services.

Jewish immigrants to Toronto can turn to the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services. Dedicated to helping immigrant Jews, it does such things as facilitate their entry into the country, assisting sponsors and providing consultation and counselling.

Don't know where to turn for information? Call Jewish Information Service, which is largely staffed by volunteers in order to provide information to the public in such areas as social services, synagogues, accommodation, Jewish holidays and community information for newcomers. It offers a daily telephone service and publishes various community directories.

Since 1901, the Jewish National Fund has been involved in reclaiming the land of Israel through afforestation, building reservoirs and dams, new housing for immigrants and soil and water research. Part of its funds are raised through its blue boxes and planting of trees, both well-known to the community.

United Israel Appeal of Canada, manages funds going to Israel and ensures that Israel receives its optimum share of funds raised in Canadian community campaigns.

Food plays an important part in the life of all Jews and the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashrut was established in order to provide supervision of food suppliers, including bakeries, butchers, caterers, restaurants and hotels. It publishes an updated directory of products and establishments it endorses.

Where do all these agencies turn when there is a meeting or function and they want to serve food? To the Lipa Green Building kosher kitchen, of course, which provides, breakfasts, lunches, dinners, snacks or anything in between.

Israelis find a home at BJC

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

"We used to feel like orphans but not anymore," said Shula Jacobi, one of 30,000 Israelis living in Toronto.

"We feel that community attitudes have changed towards us and that opening an Israeli Community Centre (638-2677) in the Bathurst Jewish Centre is a form of approval which makes us feel good," said Jacobi, the Israeli Centre's interim treasurer.

She was reflecting the "two solitudes" division in Toronto, with Israelis on one side, and the rest of the community on the other. Though Israelis have a high profile in business and the arts in Toronto, their participation in organized community events is less visible, which the new centre hopes to repair.

As David Gerichter, the centre's interim chair puts it, many Israelis have an "internal conflict" about whether to stay in Canada or go back to Israel. For those Israelis who have decided to stay in Canada, it makes sense to bring them closer to the mature, organized Jewish community, he said.

But the centre is not interested in attracting other Israelis to emigrate, he added. "We are in no way a growth industry."

Toronto's Israeli community is the fourth largest in North America, placing behind Los Angeles (150,000 to 200,000), New York (100,000) and Miami (70,000). Forty percent of Toronto Israelis have a university background and are employed in management and administrative fields. Many Israelis have their own business in construction, small manufacturing, real estate and financial services.

At the new Israeli Centre, 12 volunteers, who speak Hebrew and other languages, will take calls each morning, Monday to Friday, to answer queries from Israelis about the services and facilities available in the Jewish community and in the city at large.

For example, one woman called wanting to know whether her family could live six months in Canada and six months in Israel and still collect a Canadian pension. She was referred to the Aliyah office in Toronto. Another wanted directions on how to apply to move back to Israel from Canada.

Another 30 volunteers, doctors, lawyers, psychologists, trades people and members of the senior citizen clubs Etrog and Aluma among them, all Hebrew speaking, are available. Their free advice can be obtained through the telephone corps members like Dafna Schondorf, Tami Savion and Shula Levin.

Jacobi is high in her praise of Sandra Brown, Marty Goldberg, Alan Reitzer and Meir Klein of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto for paving the way for the new Centre office.

Among events scheduled for the next few months are a fashion show by high school students, a canoe trip and picnic on Labor Day weekend, participation in Holocaust Education Week in November and a Chanukah party.

SAJAC helps South Africans to establish in community

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When Colin Baskind, a South African-born businessman, emigrated to Canada with his family eight years ago, members of the Toronto South African Jewish community helped him get established in Canada. Baskind said he vowed to do the same for other immigrants.

Networking with other South African Jews — they gave him the names of contacts — enabled him to land a job relatively quickly, he said. One of his contacts, an Egyptian Jewish business executive, was extremely helpful, Baskind recalled.

"He didn't know me, but he gave up a lot of time and started making calls on the spot. He knew what it was like to be a Jewish immigrant."

Baskind, who now heads his own linen rental business, helps other immigrants through his volunteer work with the South African Jewish Association of Canada (SAJAC), where he has served as president for eight years. He is also on the board of Jewish Immigrant Aid Service (JIAS).

The main function of SAJAC is to help new South African Jewish immigrants adapt to Canada by locating accommodation and providing them with a networking system for finding work, he explained.

With the change in the economy jobs are harder to find, but he still gets calls from SAJAC members looking for people with specialized skills, he said.

Younger people find work faster than middle-aged people who are sponsored by their children, he said. "People 50 and over seldom do the work they are able to do."

SAJAC has 8,000 members, roughly one-third of the South African Jews living in Toronto, Baskind said. The association puts out a magazine three times a year which provides information for new immigrants, job information and job listings.

The paid advertising covers the printing and mailing costs, and it also funds a bursary for university students.

There is a separate seniors group called SAJAC (Seniors) with 300 members. They meet monthly — usually every third Sunday afternoon — at the Banbury Community Centre in the York Mills and Leslie area. Association chair Leonard Rubenstein and his wife Nancy, residents in Canada for 35 years, founded the senior's group 18 years ago. They felt their needs were different than the younger group of South Africans, Rubenstein said.

The meetings sometimes consist of lectures, but there are also organized day trips to such places as Stratford, St. Jacobs, Orillia and Woodbine Race Track. Their "big bash" is at Chanukah time Rubenstein said.

SAJAC seniors take new people under their wings, he said. "We make them feel at home and introduce them around." Although coming to Canada was an adjustment, Rubenstein is thankful to be living in Canada, he said. "It's a great country. People don't appreciate it."

Volunteers: the lifeblood of service organizations

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Service organizations could not exist without a core of dedicated volunteers always there to lend a hand where needed. Despite the high number of volunteers in the community, there is always a need for more. A sampling of the organizations seeking volunteers include:

Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, (225-2112) a centre for seniors that offers recreational, education, fitness and general interest courses to persons over age 55. As well, the centre provides health clinics, nutrition and family counselling, hot kosher lunches for a small fee, and Russian and Hebrew speaking clubs. Volunteers are always welcome at Bernard Betel, especially friendly visitors — warm, caring people with a sense of humor, willing to spend at least one hour per week visiting isolated, homebound seniors.

Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), (638-7800) a multifunctional agency providing counselling and support services to all age groups is in urgent need of men over age 19 to build a special, big brother relationship with boys between the ages of six to 16. A minimum commitment is three to five hours a week for one year and orientation and training is provided. Presently, about 20 boys are waiting for big brothers.

JF&CS also seeks tutors in all subjects for some of the children of agency clients, and seeks chaplaincy visitors to visit the Jewish residents of hospitals, rehabilitation centres and nursing homes.

Beit Halochem Canada, Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel, (488-7649) raises funds to maintain and equip Israel's four Beit Halochem centres that provide rehabilitation services for the thousands of Israeli men and women who became disabled while serving the country. Annually, a group of disabled veterans is sponsored on a two-week vacation to Toronto. The agency's Toronto office always needs volunteers to assist in clerical work such as filing and mailing.

Reena, a social service agency that supports adults with developmental disabilities (787-9554), is getting set to open the new Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre in the City of Vaughan. The 45,000-square-foot centre will feature such things as a wellness centre, gymnasium, creative arts workshop, computer centre, greenhouse and library. The centre will provide respite care and relief for those who care for their family members at home.

Volunteer opportunities, for those willing to donate a few hours a week, are plentiful. They include PAL-unteers to work one-on-one with someone with a developmental handicap, home visitors, administrative volunteers or lifeskill trainers. Public speakers serve on the speakers bureau to help educate the public, escorts take clients to classes or events and help the class instructor, family friends invite a client who may not have a family to their home and informed parents can be mentors to new parents in need of guidance.

ORT, the Organization for Educational Research and Technological Training (Toronto ORT 787-0297), operates a worldwide, non-governmental network of more than 800 vocational schools throughout the world, including about 140 in Israel. The organization is in the midst of fundraising for its new creative technology centre, a joint project between ORT and the North York Board of Education. ORT vounteers, interested in technology, education and the training of young people, can get involved at any level, from jobs that require no skills at all, to those that need people with refined skills such as marketing and writing.

Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care (785-2500) also seeks volunteers in all capacities from people to work with seniors in the areas of creative arts, music therapy or exercise classes to those who can lead discussion groups in English, Russian, Hebrew or Yiddish, do clerical work or assist in fundraising. All new volunteers take an orientation program.

A volunteer program at Baycrest for teens ages 13 to 17 gives youth the opportunity to work in the same areas as adult volunteers.

The Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation (781-3584) represents Jerusalem's Shaare Zedek Medical Centre. Volunteers are always welcome in the areas of office work, fundraising or to join the new leadership division.

Don't forget the many opportunities for helping others in other formal organizations, such as B'nai Brith, Hadassah, Mizrachi, Emunah, Na'amat, National Council of Jewish Women, Jewish Women International, Mount Sinai Hospital, schools and the many Israeli-based organizations and universities.

Starting out at a new school is never easy – new classmates, new teachers, new classes.

Starting out at university can be even harder, as you are not just at a new campus, but at a new point in your life. Suddenly, a large class doesn't have 40 students, it has 400. And the professor doesn't just forget your name, he doesn't ever know it. Your second class could be a 10-minute walk from your first – and you only have five minutes to get there.

And of course, you're supposed to be a grown up now, know where your life is headed and exactly what profession you're going to practise to earn your millions. Meanwhile, you're not even sure what book you were supposed to read for that lecture two weeks ago.

Thankfully, the community has a number of stress-escape routes, both on and off campus for students.

Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS) is the umbrella group for the Jewish student organizations on four Toronto campuses – University of Toronto, York University, Ryerson Polytechnic University and Seneca College.

"We're like a clearing house for referrals to other organizations," said Zac Kaye, director of JCS. "We want to provide a variety of services for students on campus."

JCS aims to provide programs that will strengthen Jewish identity, pride and continuity. Programs include sports and leisure activities, text study groups, Shabbat dinners and city-wide dances.

"We're planning a home food kosher service for the U of T campus," Kaye said. The service would provide kosher food at a central location on campus for both commuter and residence students.

(York University has a kosher delicatessen, L'Echaim, which provides both kosher groceries and meals to residence and commuter students.)

Monthly Shabbat dinners offered through JCS affiliates have attracted close to 40 students at a time from a wide range of religious observance.

JCS is planning to publish a brochure for High Holy Day services. The brochure will outline the various services available and list which services students can access for minimal or no cost.

JCS also recognizes the growing desire among students to gain practical work experience while in university. In the coming year a career development series will offer internship and mentorship opportunities in a variety of fields for students interested in work/study.

Israel programming also remains popular with students. Along with the annual Israel days held on the various campuses, JCS is developing summer programming in Israel.

Kefiada is a summer volunteer experience for students wishing to teach English in a camp setting. This summer JCS sent 20 university students. Another volunteer program the service is promoting is Partnership 2000. Students are sent on volunteer missions to Eilat, Toronto's sister city.

Kaye stressed that there are many extra curricular sports and social activities available on the campuses. A city-wide dance is planned for the Thanksgiving long weekend. And students are encouraged to get involved with Jewish student councils and activities planned on the separate campuses.

Outside of JCS, the broader Toronto Jewish community offers some services for students.

The Bloor Jewish Community Centre (Bloor JCC) has extensive workout facilities, including a pool, aerobics classes of all levels, free weights, an exercise room and a sloped track. There are also racquetball, hand ball and squash courts, with no court fee.

Jeff Perlmutter of the Bloor JCC said there is a reduced rate for students age 18 to 25, as well as for full-time students over 26. There is also an eight-month membership available from September to May for those students only in Toronto for the university term.

The Jewish Women's Federation is offering a home hospitality program for students needing Shabbat accomodations. Lisa Morrison, the director of the federation, said students can be paired up with families for Shabbat meals and/or Passover seders. Students in need of this service should contact the Jewish student's office on their campus.

COMMUNITY FOCUS

Bernard Betel Centre serves vital role for seniors

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living is such a vibrant place it should be a role model for other seniors centres, says Hal Jackman, Ontario's lieutenant-governor.

He spoke to 300 people at the centre's recent open house that drew an estimated 1,000 people throughout the day.

There were many new faces and new members signed up, executive director Esta Wall said in an interview. "It was really a very exciting day."

The Bernard Betel Centre is a cultural, educational, recreational and social gathering place for Jewish seniors, which offers more than 80 programs annually, ranging from tai chi to Yiddish literature. But it is also a multi-service centre providing a number of health and social support services.

The centre began in 1965 as a weekly half-day program with a handful of participants. In 1982, the centre moved to its present location at Bathurst and Steeles.

Today, the centre boasts 1,200 members with a total of 3,000 people on an annual basis making use of the centre's multiple services which include La'Briyut, the Health Centre; and kosher hot lunches and counselling.

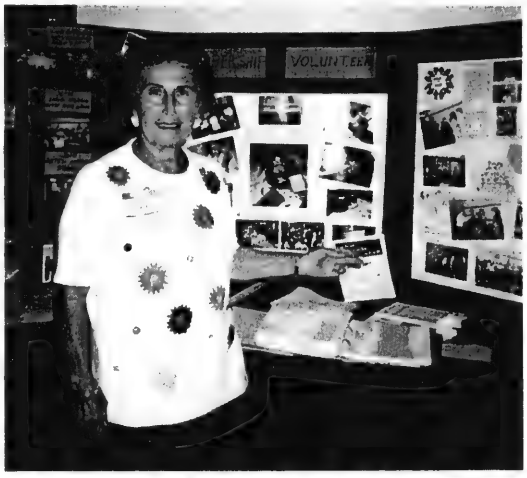
The average age of members is 77, 99 percent of whom are Jewish. About 65 percent are single, divorced or widowed women. The centre also serves a large Russian population.

The centre is staffed by 25 full and part-time workers. But there is also a large contingent of teachers hired by the centre and the North York Board of Education for specialty courses like yoga, computer studies, soap stone carving, tai chi and doll making.

It is the only seniors centre in Ontario with a health centre on the premises, Wall said. La'Briyut offers a number of programs which include blood pressure screening; chiropody and low vision clinics; nutritional counselling and weight training; support groups for osteoporosis, low vision and arthritis; lectures in alternative medicine and preventative health care and monthly healthy cooking courses. These services, available to all seniors in the community, are provided by health professionals.

The Bernard Betel Centre also organizes day trips to places like Stratford and Buffalo as well as longer trips to Florida and the Catskills. The on-site synagogue holds Shabbat and High Holy Day services which are open to the community.

The Home Support Program runs the Diners Club, which caters to a frailer population. Members participate in a morning program, eat together in a special small dining room and then go to the auditorium for the weekly concerts by local Jewish entertainers, attended by some 300 people a week.



Evelyn Rabkin, chair of volunteer committee, Bernard Betel Centre.

The Diners Club members — some are accompanied by private attendants or escorts — have the opportunity to socialize in the more intimate atmosphere of the small dining room, Wall said.

"Some of these people are quite isolated. This is a good way to get assimilated into the larger group."

She said socially isolated people need to get out as often as possible, and so the centre will be trying to extend the Diners Club to Fridays so that this group will have the opportunity to participate in oneg Shabbats.

Another home support program matches isolated seniors to volunteers who visit and/or take them on outings. The centre also provides a Meals on Wheels program delivering kosher meals to seniors living on their own, or in Jewish residences and nursing homes.

The centre gets 43 percent of its funding from the Ontario Ministry of Health, 13 percent from United Way, nine percent from Metro Community Services, eight percent from the federation. A small percentage of funds is generated by the annual $40 fee paid by centre members.

Given the general cuts in government funding for social service agencies, Wall said she is worried about how the cutbacks will impact on the centre.

"They're looking to agencies like ours for relief. It's hard to explain that we're being hit as well." She said the centre is gearing up to launch a fundraising drive

According to Wall, the Bernard Betel Centre fills a vital role for seniors. "As they age they need to maintain a sense of purpose, a sense of self-worth."

JIS has all the answers

Special to The CJN

Everything you ever wanted to know about the Toronto Jewish community and were afraid to ask is just one phone call away (635-5600). That's the number of Jewish Information Service.

The agency provides information services to the community from giving out the numbers of Jewish organizations in the Greater Toronto Area (GTA) to answering simple questions about Jewish rituals.

Some 5,000 listings accumulated by the service are on computer and can also be accessed through the Internet at the federation Web site at [http://www.feduja.org]. The agency also compiles service directories that can be purchased at a nominal price, Verbin says.

20,000 calls a year

Situated in the Lipa Green Building on Bathurst Street, Jewish Information Service has been operating under the auspices of UJA/Federation and its predecessors since its inception. A full-time staff of two and a contingent of 15 volunteers — there are two volunteers at each shift — man the three phone lines, fielding an average of 20,000 calls a year. Verbin says he expects that number to be higher for 1996.

Right now the agency is gearing up for its busy season which begins just before the High Holy Days. An average of 200 people, unaffiliated with a shul, will be calling to find out where they can attend holiday services. Jewish Information has prepared a list of 60 places across the GTA with seating available for non-members.

The holidays also trigger calls from some non-practising Jews, who may want to renew or explore their Jewish roots, but are not sure what steps to take, Verbin says. Workers will often direct these callers to the community chaplain, he adds. Tourists call to inquire about where to find kosher restaurants and synagogues, and there are sometimes questions about Israel from people planning trips there.

The agency operates a community calendar, which is a clearing house for organizations planning major events: they can call up to make sure the date of a particular event does not conflict with that of another Jewish organization, Verbin says.

School boards also call to check dates for their yearly calendars and non-Jews will call to find out about customs so they don't make any faux pas, he says.

Jewish Information also keeps a listing of Jewish schools, day cares and adult education courses, to help the community access these programs easily.

One of the most well-used service is the weekly listing of events for Jewish singles, Verbin says. There's even an after-hours hotline that was instituted two months ago. Singles can call the Jewish Information number in the evening to listen to a tape of the weekly singles events.

Jews for Judaism Ciss tackles missionary activity

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

There are more than 50 Christian missionary groups that are targeting Jews for conversion in Ontario says Julius Ciss, the executive director of Jews for Judaism's Canadian operations.

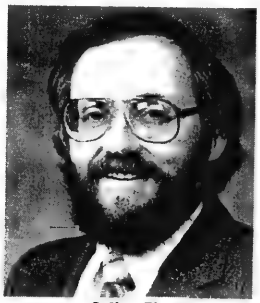
"In the Lawrence-Bathurst area, there are at least three groups overtly involved in evangelizing Jews."

Ciss and Rabbi Michael Skobac, Jews for Judaism's education director, spearhead the counter-missionary organization which is active in educational, outreach and counselling activities. Their mission is to counteract the increased missionary activity that is focused on Jews.

"There are roughly 600 well-funded missionary groups in North America with a combined budget of more than $200 million," says Ciss.

"Along with door-to-door ministries, these groups, like Jews for Jesus, buy full-page newspaper ads around the Jewish holidays." They exploit Jewish symbols and phrases and some worship in churches called "messianic synagogues" with kippah-wearing ministers calling themselves rabbis, he says.

Charisma Magazine, a Pentecostal Christian publication, reported recently that "more Jews have converted to Christianity in the past 19 years than in the last 19 centuries."



Julius Ciss

Ciss says that the missionaries are most successful through Christian contacts with Jews such as a fellow student, a co-worker, nannies or neighbors. "It is with these individuals that the Jew often develops open lines of communication and a friendly rapport so the Jew's guard is down and he feels less threatened by overt attempts by these individuals."

One of the deceptive methods of influence the missionaries use is to say you don't have to convert to Christianity but by accepting Jesus as the Jewish messiah you are fulfilling or completing your Judaism, he says.

Proselytizing happens behind closed doors and any force that discourages their belief in Jesus may be interpreted as a satanic force. "It is hard to get Hebrew-Christians to come to speak to us. Our experience is that the Jew who comes to Christianity never made informed decision."

Ciss in action

With critical decision-making they usually get a second opinion but these converts are only presented with the Christian position, he says. "The majority of those who listen to the Jewish argument against Christianity renounce Christianity and return to Judaism."

He notes that without exception, Jews who get involved with Christianity come from spiritually shallow upbringings. As an example, the Russian Jewish community is targeted because they were spiritually starved in the former Soviet Union.

He believes that to most Jews who convert to Christianity, Judaism is meaningless and not spiritually fulfilling — it is practised by rote, it is a visit to the synagogue once or twice a year or a Passover seder.

"Jewish parents have to stop assuming that Judaism is only a football to be passed on to the next generation. Instead it is a legacy of rich spirituality that must be embraced by themselves personally. One can assume that by osmosis, that through the parents' positive example, the children will be able to carry the torch of Judaism.

"Parents rely on the religious school system as an antibiotic, to fix a problem when the problem is them." He says you shouldn't blame your kids, and the Jewish school system, but look at yourself and your commitment to Judaism.

Although the elderly and teenagers are heavily targeted by missionary groups, Ciss says the entire community is vulnerable because there is a reduced commitment to Judaism thus creating a Jewish rootlessness.

He explains that Jews for Judaism has two primary goals — to provide preventive counter-missionary educational programs that instil a greater appreciation of and commitment to Jewish beliefs and values and secondly to win back those Jews who have been influenced by missionaries.

JNF team effort makes arid country bloom

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

The Jewish National Fund has a history of turning the marvellous into something that appears commonplace, muses Toronto executive director Ben Prossin.

Its many projects, from reclaiming desert, planting trees and building roads to research into irrigation and fighting forest fires, attest to its 95-year history of accomplishing the seemingly impossible — making an arid country bloom.

While JNF is "always doing exciting things," Prossin told The CJN with a twinkle in his eye, this year is even more special, with two projects designed to honor Jerusalem 3000 "as gifts to the city and the people of Jerusalem."

Gan Yaldei Yisroel (the garden of the children of Israel), funded by the children of the Diaspora and of Jerusalem, part of the Jerusalem Peace Forest, will be built on the eastern slopes of the city, facing the Temple Mount and the Western Wall.

Eight gates will each tell the story of one facet of the holy city: Jewish life beyond the city walls; yearning, prayer and hope; the return to Zion; the Bible; the National homeland; the birth of the state of Israel; united Jerusalem and the city of peace.

The second gift is the KKL-JNF Events Centre, a huge, outdoor ampitheatre, seating 40,000 people, which will be used for cultural and national events.

Located in the south end of the city, near the Teddy Kollek sports stadium and one of Canadian developer David Azrieli's megamalls, the park will also have picnic sites, recreation areas and playgrounds.

The projects were launched in Toronto in March with a gala celebration at the Leah Posluns Theatre, where eight prominent Torontonians were honored, including Irving and Madam Justice Rosalie Abella, Judy Feld Carr, Garth Drabinsky, Moshe Ronen, Allan Silber and Rabbi Irwin Witty.

The regular work of the Jewish National Fund continues, Prossin said. Action Plan Negev, a joint program of JNF, the Jewish Agency and the Israel Ministry of Agriculture, is designed to develop the Negev, which comprises 60 per cent of the country, all of which is within the Green Line, and thus will be unaffected by any peace process decisions.

Projects in Action Plan Negev include hothouses, relocating citrus growing, fish breeding, and olive plantations. Research and development of scarce water resources is also a priority.

Prossin is an unashamed idealist about the place of the Jewish National Fund, "the peoples' fund," as he constantly refers to it.

Noting that many Israeli prime ministers, especially the late David Ben-Gurion and Yitzhak Rabin, were strong supporters of JNF, he emphasized that the pennies donated in the famous blue boxes by rich and poor Jews all over the world "built the Jewish state."

"Jews in the shtetls of Poland and Russia and [early immigrants to] New York and Toronto were caught up in the romance of the kibbutz and the moshav. They felt that that was how they could help build the third Jewish commonwealth, the new Jewish state."

Feigenbaum served as Weizmann's messenger

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

An octogenarian supporter of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science is a living link with the man for whom the Israeli university is named.

Sam Feigenbaum, 88, was a messenger for Chaim Weizmann some 75 years ago during Weizmann's visits to Warsaw once or twice a year. Weizmann would lend support to the local Jewish community and speak on behalf of the Zionist organization, of which he was then president.

Feigenbaum remembers Weizmann as "one of the greatest Jews that ever lived" for both his role in making the Balfour Declaration a reality and his concern for Polish Jewry.

Michael Cylan, a family friend and then secretary of the national minorities bloc in the Polish parliament, chose Feigenbaum as a messenger because he was a good runner and a member of the Maccabee club, which met in the same building as the Zionist organization.

Polish Jewish leader Yizhak Gruenbaum, who was to become Israel's minister of the interior in its 1948-49 provisional government, was a member of the Polish parliament when Feigenbaum was a messenger. The young boy would bring messages from Weizmann to Gruenbaum's sixth-floor apartment in a building with no elevator, about three blocks away.

Because of changing borders, Feigenbaum received his early elementary schooling in Russian; when he was a little older, he studied in German; and finally in Polish. At home, the family spoke Yiddish. Every evening after school, until his late teens, Feigenbaum attended an Orthodox yeshiva.

As a young man, he was drafted into the Polish army, where he served for two years in the heavy artillery unit before entering his father's leather goods business.

He went on to become a factory manager, but decided to emigrate in 1935 because of the political situation.

Feigenbaum and his wife Phyllis joined his brother in Simcoe, Ontario, where Sam opened a retail business called the Reliable Store. He began importing soap and mouthwash from Israel with the idea of supporting the country economically.

In Simcoe, the Feigenbaums were one of eight Jewish families. They attended synagogue in nearby Brantford, and raised two young girls who had been orphaned during the Holocaust.

Feigenbaum moved to Toronto following Phyllis' death in 1960 and opened an importing business, working until he was in his 70s.

On one of his first visits to Israel, Feigenbaum visited his old friend Cylan who took him to see Weizmann, the new president of the fledgling country. "Mr. President, do you recognize this man?" Cylan asked.

"He stood up, looked in my eyes, and said, 'Is that you, Simchale?' "

A longtime generous supporter of Israeli causes such as Bar-Ilan University, the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, the Jewish National Fund and United Jewish Appeal, Feigenbaum has a special affection for the Weizmann Institute, where two residences for foreign students are named for him and his wife.

COMMUNITY FOCUS

Federation aims to serve needs of entire community

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

The mandate of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto is to ensure that this is a community that cares about its members and stands by such basic Jewish values as concern for the poor and for the sick, educating its children, and caring for each other.

This is the philosophy that propels Sandy Brown, who has been president of Federation for a little over a year.

"We are not affiliated with any ideological group. Our role is to bring all facets of the community together — to look at klal Yisrael in the most positive way," she said in a recent interview.

The Toronto community faces many challenges, she said. For one thing, "since we are not really certain what the impact of government cutbacks will be, we have to examine our [social] service needs."

When those needs are determined, she said, the community must ensure that there is no unnecessary duplication of services.

Ontario, she added, is one of the only provinces not offering government funding for Jewish education.

"We must see how we can continue to assist in providing the best education possible in both day schools and supplementary schools."

Continuity remains a major issue, she said. To assist in the battle against intermarriage and assimilation, last year Federation awarded continuity grants to several agencies, schools and programs.

"These grants touched the fringes of the community. It got people not connected with the community involved."

Israel is a priority to Brown. She suggested that the Diaspora should "plan a long-term relationship that goes beyond the merely financial," such as using it more and more as an educational resource and taking advantage of the increasing economic opportunities.

That is not a one-way street, she added as an aside. "North America has much to offer Israel, especially dealing with such issues as assimilation of immigrant groups and intermarriage."

It is a major challenge for Federation to raise "enough endowment-type funds to sustain the community." These funds, she said, must be found in addition to the annual campaign contributions.

Strong relationships must be forged between professional staff and volunteers. This will help overcome the fact that "UJA is not the only game in town in terms of donations."

Lay people must be made to feel they are part of the decision-making process. They should have a say in where their contribution goes and how it is used, she believes.

There is a huge population in the north Bathurst corridor, she said — over 40,000 Jews. "It is a challenge to connect to these newer, younger members of the community."

Sandy Brown

People take for granted the strengths of the Toronto Jewish community, its educational resources, its strong leadership, its diversity, its growth, Brown said. "But we must not be complacent. We must keep it that way."

An attempt is being made, she said, to integrate UJA and Federation activities into one entity.

"We want to integrate staff, so that they will work so closely together that they will be able to move and flow between fundraising, planning and service functions."

This is happening across Canada, she said. "National Jewish agencies are trying to come up with proposals to avoid duplication of services and budgets, and to have a more effective delivery of national objectives."

Such agencies as Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, the Canada-Israel Committee, Canadian Jewish Congress, the Federations and UIA/UJA are taking part in this effort.

"We Jewish people all have different opinions, but we have one thing in common — the love of our people.

"We have to find ways to build bridges. That's what Federation is all about," she mused, "building bridges."

COMMUNITY FOCUS

In search of Inuit art

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Beverley Borins, 73, admits to being obsessed with Inuit art. The Toronto-born handcrafter and former gallery owner isn't exaggerating.

A case in point: Several years ago Borins, accompanied by the youngest of her three grown children, was travelling in the high Arctic when an airplane flight from Pond Inlet to Pagnirtung turned nightmarish. The engine reverse mechanism (used for landing) had failed, and the plane was diverted to Iqaluit, where the longest runway in the north offered the best chance of a safe landing.

Miraculously, the plane touched down "like a bird," and the emergency vehicles awaiting its arrival were not needed.

Borins didn't miss a beat. On learning that it would take several hours to repair the plane, she found someone to drive her to nearby Apex to buy hard-to-find fabric for a traditional Inuit beaded parka known as an Attigi.

Borins worked on the parka for two years and eight months, sewing on thousands of beads by hand.

A member of the Pomegranate Guild, an organization of Jewish handcrafters, Borins has worked in a variety of media.

Recent projects, initiated at the request of her young granddaughter, included a stuffed monkey and a Haida button blanket with 1,400 buttons. Over a dozen mosaics, for which she cut each piece of stone, hang on her walls.

Borins' interests are reflected in her attire: a necklace made of African trade beads adorns her classic blouse; her skirt is one she made herself of handprinted fabric from Santa Fe; an ivory bracelet on her left wrist and a muskox horn ring in the shape of "two little kissy bears" complete the outfit.

Her obsession with Inuit art began some 25 years ago. After she and her late husband, Sidney, retired from the hotel business, Borins opened a gallery for wall hangings and handcrafted items called Up the Wall.

Although she sold items from all over the world, Borins quickly realized that she hadn't been supporting aboriginal artists. The result was a deep fascination with the Inuit world.

In the past 15 years, Borins has been to the far north a dozen times, and has spoken about her experiences to schoolchildren and seniors. She has participated in an all-night seal hunt, travelled by Skidoo, slept on the ice and visited in numerous Inuit homes.

"I go primarily not to buy. I want to know the people and their art. I'm interested in going into people's homes, talking with them, and watching them work."

Sidney, who died earlier this year, never accompanied her on the trips, preferring the comforts of home — things like beds and easily accessible bathrooms. Once, Borins recalls, she had to put on boots and a parka — in the summer — to go from her cabin to the bathroom facilities.

Borins acquired a taste for adventure some years ago when her oldest son invited her to join him as he travelled around China before a summer teaching stint there.

She is fascinated by art from all over the world. "I like anything unusual that's hand-made, and the more primitive the better."

Rubinovitch decision led to a family dynasty

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Like many Jews in the former Russian Empire, the children of Benjamin and Ester Rubinovitch of Zhlobin, Belarus, faced a difficult decision in the first years of this century: to stay or to go?

There were at least eight children in the Rubinovitch (later Rubinoff) family. Four of them, the risk-takers, came to Canada with their families, while the other four stayed behind, seemingly willing to weather an increasingly oppressive climate at home.

Many of their cousins from Zhlobin and neighboring towns also chose Canada, a land which for them was no less vast than Russia but which, unlike Russia, signified vast opportunity and freedom. Among the many, Meyer Feivel Naftolin and Etta Rubinoff Naftolin landed with their children at Quebec City on June 20, 1907.

One can visualize them, a bewildered Yiddish-speaking family on the docks of the bustling French port, gazing up at the looming Chateau Frontenac and equally imposing Citadel. Presciently, they didn't linger in French Canada, but travelled westward by train to Kingston, where they lived for a year or two before continuing to Toronto.

It was in Toronto that their son, Isaac Naftolin, married Ester Arnoff in 1912: they are my grandparents. Second cousins marrying was evidently no big deal in an extended family tree with many such couplings. Dozens of Naftolin and Rubinoff cousins settled in Toronto; a few went to Windsor, Detroit, New York and Florida. In Toronto, members of this cousinhood worked hard to establish themselves as they diligently obeyed the biblical edicts to be fruitful and to multiply. They stuck together instinctively as a means of survival.

They became grocers, bakers, tinsmiths, tailors, barbers, junkyard dealers, owners of department stores. Many lived within walking distance of each other on streets like Fenning, Shaw, Ossington, Tecumseh, Niagara, Queen and Dundas. Others lived in the Junction, a west Toronto neighborhood. By 1928 their number had become so large that a family organization was formed: Agudas Hamispoche, the United Families Organization.

A United Families Loan Society was formed in 1929 to help relatives in financial distress. A Gmilas Chesed, or Benevolent Society, came in 1933 to allow members to borrow amounts of $100 or more interest free. In 1930, the Ladies Auxiliary maintained an active social calendar of teas, rummage sales and other events to raise money for charity. There were anniversary dinners, social affairs, family celebrations, picnics in High Park and on Centre Island.

In 1948, the organization was prosperous enough to acquire its own building on College St. W. "The Hall" was a gathering place for weekly breakfasts and many family events. My earliest childhood memories of the hall date from the late 1950s. I remember a plurality of anonymous but adoring adults, Canadian and Israeli flags posted side by side, and photographs of loved ones from the Old Country staring down from the walls. In the 1960s, the organization moved into a new hall near Wilson and Bathurst (since sold).

In 1993, several hundred cousins attended the Agudas Hamispoche's 65th anniversary banquet in a north Toronto synagogue.

Today, the Rubinoff-Naftolin cousinhood is more numerous than ever. From five Rubinovitch siblings in the Old Country, including Benjamin, has sprung an enormous family that, in Toronto alone, accounts for an estimated one-half to one per cent of the city's current Jewish population of about 165,000. Alas, the Agudas Hamispoche – which was apparently Toronto's only family-based landsmanshaft organization – may not survive long into the next century, a casualty of the fast-paced, impersonal, technological age in which we live.

Broken during the Holocaust era, contact with our surviving Soviet cousins was miraculously restored in the 1970s after a newly-released Soviet Jew passed through Toronto making inquiries on behalf of friends left behind. In 1988, I learned that a Toronto cousin, Frances Ittleman, had been corresponding in Yiddish with an elderly relative in Russia. Attaining an address in cyrillic script, I penned a brief letter in Yiddish with the help of another cousin, and mailed it along with copies of several old family photos.

Months later, a response in Yiddish arrived from the daughter of the woman to whom I had written.

"I am sad to write that my mother died on the 30th of December," my Russian cousin, Bella Gintsbourg, wrote. "I studied the photos you sent with tears in my eyes. Unfortunately, they arrived after my mother had died. My mother used to cry when she looked at the old pictures of her family in America."

Still, Gintsbourg was able to Family dynasty thriving

identify all of the unknown faces in the old family photographs I had sent her. She was also able to relate the unknown fate of our family's ancestral village.

"All Jews were executed in Zhlobin on April 12, 1942, on the first day of Passover," she reported. "They were buried in a mass grave and now there is a monument there."

I learned much from that first letter from Bella Gintsbourg. Thus began a prolonged exchange of letters between Toronto and the former Leningrad, now St. Petersburg. Through this correspondence, I learned first-hand of the many difficult choices that politics has forced upon the Jews of the former Soviet Empire.

According to Gintsbourg, her parents had survived because her grandparents had left Zhlobin for Leningrad just after the Revolution of 1917 "in order to give the children a proper education."

Before the German siege of Leningrad, they moved to Novo Sibersk, Siberia. "It's amazing to think how we have grown up in absolutely different environments and lived absolutely different lives," she wrote.

Circumstances were forcing the Gintsbourgs and many other Jews to leave, she wrote in 1990. Close to retirement age and feeling too old to start a new life elsewhere, they had applied to emigrate to America but without luck. While Canada was not a feasible option for them, members of our family set up a fund to help them. Perhaps they would go to Israel, or perhaps Germany to be near their son, who with his family was living near Rome.

Upon emigrating to Germany, they found that "everything we heard in Russia about how Germans want to take in Russian emigrants was wrong," she wrote. "Nobody needs us here."

Living on social assistance, they found even a visit to Italy beyond their means. After eight months, they emigrated to Bat Yam, a Tel Aviv suburb. Life was a bit easier but still no bed of roses, they wrote; somewhat stoically, they didn't elaborate on their complaints.

That was in 1993. I wrote back after a few months but the post office returned my letter. Evidently, the Gintsbourgs had moved and had left no forwarding address. On a visit to Israel in 1994, I found they were not listed in the phone book. Was our correspondence to terminate so abruptly? Would there be no meeting between two branches of a family that had separated nearly 90 years before?

Last spring it was my good fortune to be in Israel again. While in Jaffa, a town midway between Tel Aviv to the north and Bat Yam to the south, I asked a taxi driver to take me to the last known address I had for the Gintsbourgs in Bat Yam. It was a spur of the moment thing. I didn't know what I would find. But I considered it a very good omen that the taxi driver was friendly and could speak Hebrew, English, Yiddish and a smattering of Russian.

At the apartment block, another name was on the mailbox. Still, we entered the dim corridor and climbed the stairs. I knocked on the door and heard a woman's voice.

"Bella Gintsbourg?" I asked.

"Da," came the response, then something in Russian.

Yiza, my driver, took over. I heard him say my name and explain something about a cousin from Canada. The door was opened to reveal my Soviet cousins, Bella and Volodya Gintsbourg, looking bewildered.

Bella stared intently, apparently recognizing me from the photographs I had sent. I stared back, seeing a face that could have belonged to one of my Toronto relatives. To the best of my knowledge, this was the first time the two branches of our family had come together in almost 90 years.

Inviting us into their apartment, Bella and Volodya directed me to the most comfortable armchair. We attempted to converse in Russian and Yiddish through the overtaxed linguistic conduit of my driver-translator.

"Yiza, tell them I was in Israel two years ago but couldn't find their phone number."

A moment later I heard: "They say they're not listed in the phone book because they took over the phone from the previous tenant. They want to know, how is your mother?"

If Yiza minded being the conveyor of small talk in three languages, scrambling here for a phrase in Yiddish and there for a word in Russian, he did not show it.

It amazed me that after three years in Israel, the Gintsbourgs spoke almost no Hebrew. Since they are retired, they live in an isolated community, interacting primarily with other Russian emigres.

The visit was short and sweet. As I was leaving, Bella and Volodya gave me their phone number and a promise that they would write. In return, I gave them a bottle of Seagram's Whiskey that I had brought from Canada on a hunch that it might come in handy.

As Yiza and I drove away, I thought: there but for the grace of God go I. I felt extremely lucky that my great-grandparents had chosen Canada, a land of many blessings and opportunities, a land that has been unfailingly good to us.

Torah view of organ donation adapts to changing technology

By RABBI BARUCH FRYDMAN-KOHL

During the past two years in Toronto, we have witnessed a number of campaigns which sought to find a bone marrow "match" to provide a life-sustaining transplant for an individual afflicted with a leukemia-like illness. Each of these efforts has brought forth an outpouring of financial support and volunteers for blood tests.

In 1994, Moment Magazine headlined the issue of organ donation and recounted two cases regarding this type of procedure. Dr. Joel Rosh, an Orthodox Jew who co-directed the liver transplant program at Mt. Sinai in New York City, told of an Israeli girl flown to the United States for a transplant. On route, she was declared brain dead. The team assembled to save her life turned to the family to request the donation of the remaining healthy organs. They said no. In the other incident, Alisa Flatow was killed in a terrorist attack at Gush Katif in the Gaza Strip. Her father flew to Israel, identified his daughter and was asked whether he would consent to the donation of her organs. He consulted with his rabbi and decided to donate six of her organs to six recipients. As a result, four people lived and Alisa's corneas were saved for later use.

What is the view of our Torah tradition regarding these medical procedures? In responding, it should be noted that there are three interrelated questions: Is it permissible to accept a donated organ? May a living person offer an organ to another individual? May one arrange for a post-mortem organ donation?

In the past, when these procedures were experimental, our tradition viewed such operations as unwarranted for the patient and risky for the donor. In 1961, Rabbi Moshe Feinstein prohibited transplantation. He reaffirmed that decision in 1968. Similar positions were taken by Rabbi Eliezer Waldenberg and the former chief rabbi of Israel, Rabbi Yehudah Unterman. These rabbis were concerned that the patient's status might be compromised by risky surgery. Thus, an early consensus emerged in opposition to transplantation in both rabbinic and medical circles. However, as the risk/benefit ratio changed, so did the entire outlook of Jewish law.

The first shift took place regarding corneal and skin transplantation. Later, as the success rate for kidney transplantation changed, so did the attitude regarding its acceptability both for the recipient and the donor. By 1972, Rabbi Feinstein had revised his initial opposition to indicate that if there is a 50 percent possibility of success, the patient may elect surgery and if the success rate is higher, the patient must undergo the procedure.

More recently, Rabbi Moshe Meiselman even argues that one may choose a risky procedure if it seems to be the best path to long-term survival. The Toronto Star recently reported the comment of Dr. Ronald Busattil, head of the liver transplant program of the University of California at Los Angeles, that "new anti-rejection drugs, new preservation methods and refinements in surgical techniques have greatly improved the survival rate of transplanted organs over the past five years while cutting their costs nearly in half." These developments have triggered an increase in transplantation and a generally positive perspective regarding receiving the donation by Jewish legal authorities.

Affirmative obligation to save life of endangered human being

On what basis does Judaism permit a person to donate his or her life organs to others? The Torah tells us "Lo taamod al dam re'ekha, You shall not stand idly by the blood of your neighbor" (Leviticus 19:16). This verse creates an affirmative obligation to save the life of an endangered human being. Moreover, the Talmud interprets the commandment to restore lost property (hashavat avedah, Deuteronomy 22:1) to apply to the effort to restore lost health and well-being (Sanhedrin 73a).

Finally, the mandate to preserve life, piku'ah nephesh takes precedence over most other religious requirements. Former British chief rabbi, Immanuel Jakobovits succinctly summarizes these ideals: "It is obligatory to disregard laws conflicting with the immediate claims of life and ... it is sinful to observe laws which are in suspense on account of danger to life or health ... It is not only permitted but imperative to disregard laws in conflict with life or health" (Jewish Medical Ethics, p. 50).

The obligation, "Do not stand idly by the blood of your neighbor" requires one to help another when there is no danger to oneself. Generally speaking, supererogation is not required. Granted that self-exposure is not required, may one still take the risk? Blood donation is a relatively innocuous procedure, but kidney or bone marrow transplantation involve more hazard to the donor. An early responsum states that the loss of an organ to save the life of another puts one in the category of a pious fool, chasid shoteh (Teshuvot Radbaz –627). Based on that opinion, some authorities prohibited donating an organ unless there was absolutely no danger. Others have contended that such procedures now involve minimal danger (for example, under two percent for kidney donors) and the ability of the body to function without the particular organ is not in question, therefore, such a procedures should be permitted (Barkai 3/ Fall 1985, and Rabbi Eliezer Weldenberg, Tzitz Eliezer 10:25, pp. 5-12, revising his earlier prohibition).

In the Spring of 1996, the Committee of Jewish Law and Standards of the Rabbinical Assembly (the authorative legal decision-maker for Conservative Judaism) accepted a tshuvah (legal decision) by Rabbi Joseph Prouser on the subject of post-mortem organ donation. Rabbi Prouser noted that since the human body is sacred, holiness adheres even after a death. Accordingly, Jewish law prohibits nivul hamet, benefitting from a cadaver, as well as obligates us to ensure a timely burial halanat hamet. Ordinarily, all these would militate against doing anything to the dead other than arranging for a timely burial.

However, there is a strong argument for setting aside these prohibitions to allow the "harvesting" of organs after death for the purpose of transplantation. Rabbi Unterman, revised his initial prohibition and developed a strong case in favor of organ donation. "Regarding the question of whether the Law permits surgical removal of tissue from a dead body ... to be transplanted as an organic part of the living ... I find the matter to be quite straightforward. Since these procedures constitute preservation of life there is no difficulty. After all, weighty Torah prohibitions are set aside for the preservation of life. Therefore, surgical procedures conducted to save a life are absolutely permitted" (Shevet Miyehudah, p. 54, 1983). Rabbi Prouser and the Committee on Jewish Law and Standards concurred with his reasoning.

What about non-life threatening transplantation? May the dead body be used for corneal transplantation? Rabbi Unterman ruled that eyesight is critical to a full life and such transplantation would legitimate the use of a deceased donor and not

Robert Engel and Tamara Stieber

A multi-generational link

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

The bond between grandparents and grandchildren is often a strong one.

The bond between York University graduate student Tamara Stieber and her grandfather, Robert Engel, has an even more special component.

Engel, former chair of the Holocaust Memorial and Education Committee, is a Holocaust survivor who frequently speaks to groups about his experiences in the Netherlands and in Westerbork concentration camp.

But like all survivors of that terrible time, he is getting older. Stieber is determined that his witness will not be lost.

Engel is also concerned. "Teachers always say that of any education on the Holocaust, survivors are the most effective teaching tool," he said in an interview. "But what will happen when we are gone?"

Stieber has joined him in a mentoring program, in which, as often as possible, she goes with him when he speaks.

"Just my being there makes a statement," Stieber said. "There is a two-generation gap between him and the kids he speaks to. I am like a bridge."

While Engel does most of the talking, Stieber is there to answer questions as well. But most of all, she is there to absorb his manner of speaking, his words, his message.

"I want to anticipate what they will ask, and see how he deals with it," she said.

Engel plans to make a 20-minute tape of his talk for her to play when she goes alone to speak.

The Holocaust is "not just my family's history, it's Jewish history," Stieber said. "It's not just my grandparents, it's every grandparent."

Nevertheless, for the families of survivors, "there's a difference to how we look at it. We can put faces to the stories. We have a moral obligation to make sure that those stories are not forgotten.

"I want to be his voice when he is gone."

So far, Stieber and Engel are the only grandparent-grandchild team, according to Pnina Zilberman, director of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto. But she thinks the idea is a sound one. She wants to encourage others to join them and is eager to hear from those who are interested.

People tend to look at survivors' experiences during the Holocaust as being all of their existence, Engel mused. "But I had a life before and a good life after."

"And I'm part of his life after," his granddaughter added.

Torah view of organ donations

violate the three prohibitions indicated. Another consideration was raised by an early decision of Rabbi Ezekiel Landau of Prague (Noda Beyehudah, Yorah De'ah –210) regarding autopsy. Such a procedure would ordinarily be seen as desecration of the deceased body. However, if information from an autopsy might save a life in a timely manner, then it might be permissible. The Law Committee argued that in our world, where information is transmitted electronically and body organs can be transported quickly throughout the world, it is possible to save the life of an individual in Canada with an organ from another country; therefore the person who is ill is always immediately before us. In the spring of 1996, a bone marrow transplant involved a donor from South Africa and a recipient in Toronto.

The Globe and Mail reports that although 90 percent of Canadians agree with the principle of organ donation, only a small percentage of available organs are ever donated. As many as 25 tissues and organs can be transplanted and one person's decision to donate may benefit as many as ten people. There are no chronological age limits to becoming a donor; physical health is the determining factor. However, in 1994, while 56,000 people in the United States awaited transplants, only 19,000 received them and 3,000 patients died while waiting. An estimated 100,000 people never got onto any waiting list. Understanding this, the Law Committee contended that since we are prohibited against unnecessary destruction of anything potentially useful to others (bal tashit, from Deuteronomy 20:19), we mandated to give of our bodily tissues to save the lives of others. As Rabbi Prouser observes, not using viable human organs to save another person's life is "tantamount to the destruction of rare, desperately needed medical supplies."

In a new and bold development, the Law Committee decided that giving consent for post-mortem tissue donation should be considered a moral obligation (chiyuv) to save the life of another person. This obligation may be fulfilled by completing donor cards and by next-of-kin giving consent if, God forbid, a dear one is suddenly killed. By acting with this awareness of moral obligation, our deeds of loving-kindness can bring glory to God, great good to the living and honor to the dead.

ROSH HASHANAH FOODS

Here's a recipe for getting food ready on time

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

No doubt about it, when the High Holidays roll around we absolutely, positively try and direct all our thoughts to a higher level. We have every intention of leaving our mind and hearts open to Hashem and become one with our community during services. However, there comes a point somewhere after the Torah service, probably during Musaf, where those random thoughts of "I wonder if I have enough food" or "will I be able to beat everyone home to get things on the table before everyone gets there" intrude.

Relax, enjoy the Adon Olam and know EVERYONE else is worrying about their holiday meals too.

We're all in the same "time" boat preparation — serving wise, that is. Services all get out about the same time and everyone wants to be able to be a guest at their own table. The key to making it happen, however, is being able to have things ready to go as soon as you walk through the door.

With the exception of rewarming the main course, side dishes or cholent, everything should be on their serving plates, covered and ready to set out. Keeping with the early prep motif you should set your table the day before and the wine and challah can be put out just before everyone sits down. Don't, however, cut the apples for the apple and honey until just before you serve them. The apple slices will brown unless coated with lemon juice and quite frankly I think they taste better au natural.

Finding recipes that lend themselves to early preparation and still taste great when reheated is sometimes a challenge. The following recipes all incorporate either apples, honey or both and can all be made well in advance of your meal.

SCALLOPED SWEET POTATOES AND APPLES

- 8 sweet potatoes, chunked, peeled and cooked
- 4 Granny Smith apples, peeled, cored and sliced thin
- ½ cup brown sugar
- ½ cup pecan pieces
- 1 tsp. salt
- ½ tsp. ground mace
- ¼ tsp. nutmeg
- 3 tbsp. margarine, melted

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 9x13 pan (or 3 quart baking dish). Combine the apples and potato pieces in the pan and sprinkle the brown sugar, pecans, salt, mace, nutmeg and margarine over the top. Cover and bake for 40 to 50 minutes. This can be made a day or two ahead and only cooked for 20 to 30 minutes and then reheated just before serving.

(Serves 6 to 7)

CRUNCHY APPLE SALAD

- 1 cup diced unpeeled apples (red or green)
- 1 cup diced bananas
- 1 tbsp lemon juice
- ½ cup drained pineapple tidbits
- ½ cup raisins
- ½ cup chopped pecans or walnuts
- ⅓ cup mayonnaise
- red leaf lettuce

In a large bowl toss together the apples, bananas and lemon juice. Add the pineapple, raisins and nuts. Toss gently. Add the mayonnaise and mix thoroughly. Place lettuce leaves on individual salad plates and spoon salad on top.

(Serves 6 — can be doubled or tripled)

ORANGE HONEY DRESSING

- ¼ tsp paprika
- ½ tsp. dry mustard
- 1 tsp. salt
- ½ tsp. celery salt
- ½ cup honey
- 3 tbsp. lemon juice
- 2 tbsp. kosher cider or wine vinegar
- 3 tbsp. frozen orange juice concentrate, thawed
- 1 cup salad oil

In a large bowl combine all the dry ingredients. Add the honey, lemon juice, vinegar and orange juice concentrate. Blend well. Beating constantly add the oil. Continue beating for several minutes. (You can do this in the blender or food processor if you prefer) Chill. Shake well before using. Great over mixed greens tossed with strawberries and sunflower seeds. Makes 1 pint.

APPLE STREUSEL MUFFINS

- 2 cups flour
- ½ cup sugar
- 2 tsp. baking powder
- ½ tsp. salt
- ½ cup margarine (or butter if you want it dairy)
- 1 large tart apple, cored, peeled and diced (1 cup)
- ½ tsp grated lemon zest
- 1 egg
- ⅔ cup non dairy creamer (or milk)
- ½ tsp. lemon zest
- ¼ cup chopped walnuts
- 2 tbsp. sugar

Puree in food processor or blender until smooth. (Recipe can be prepared to this point and refrigerated, covered, up to 1 day.)

ROSH HASHANAH FOODS

Preheat oven to 425º. In a large bowl sift together the flour, ½ cup sugar, baking powder and salt. Cut in the margarine. Reserve ½ cup of this mixture for the crumb topping and set it aside. In the bowl, add the diced apple and ½ teaspoon lemon zest. Add the non-dairy creamer and egg. Blend until mixture is moist.

Spoon into 12 muffin tins. Blend the remaining crumb mixture with the lemon zest, nuts, and sugar. Sprinkle the topping over the muffins and bake 20 minutes. (serves 12)

APPLE VEGETABLE SALAD

1 pound fresh asparagus
3 red delicious apples
2 small zucchini
1 avocado
spinach or Romaine lettuce
lemon dressing

Lemon Dressing:

1 lemon quartered
1 green onion
½ tsp. kosher dry mustard
½ tsp. celery seed
½ cup water
¼ tsp black pepper
salt and pepper to taste
3 tbsp. brown sugar
⅓ cup kosher apple flavored liquor
2 tart apples, peeled and cored and sliced thin

In a blender or food processor process the lemon and green onion until they are fine. Add the mustard, celery seeds, water and pepper. Process until smooth. Set aside. Cook the asparagus uncovered in slightly salted boiling water for approximately 4 to 5 minutes. Cover and cook an additional 4 to 5 minutes. Drain and cool. Peel and slice the apples, zucchini and avocado into slices.

Arrange the asparagus in the centre on a serving plate on top of the lettuce leaves. Arrange apples, zucchini and avocado around the sides. Chill. Drizzle with dressing just before serving. (serves 4)

BAKED CHICKEN WITH APPLES

3 pounds chicken, cut up
2 cups apple cider
1 cup flour
1 tbsp. ground ginger
2 tsp. ground cinnamon

Place the chicken in 2 zip lock plastic bags. Pour the apple cider over the chicken, close the bags and refrigerate the chicken pieces for at least 6 hours but no more than 12. Preheat oven to 350º. In a shallow bowl, combine the flour, ginger, cinnamon and salt and pepper. Remove the chicken from the cider but save the cider. Dredge the chicken in the flour mixture and place it in a shallow baking dish. Bake the chicken, uncovered, for 40 minutes. (You can cool and refrigerate the chicken at this point and then finish it off ½ hour before serving. If you're going to do this, boil the cider for 5 minutes and then cool and store.)

Combine the cider, brown sugar, apple liquor and apple slices. Pour this mixture over the chicken and bake for 25 minutes more, basting occasionally. (serves 6 - this can be doubled or tripled.)

1 bunch or bag of spinach, washed and stemmed
1 tbsp. finely chopped parsley

In large skillet, heat half the oil and butter over medium high heat. Add onions and carrots, tossing until coated with butter mixture. Season with salt and pepper. Cover and roast in 400 F oven 15 minutes.

Meanwhile, in separate skillet, heat remaining oil. Add parsnips and celery root, tossing to coat with oil. Season with salt and pepper. Add to onion and carrots; cover and return to oven about 30 minutes or until tender.

Heat remaining butter in skillet; add mushrooms and saute over high heat until golden. Season with salt and pepper. Add to onion mixture; toss well. Add spinach and cook just until it wilts, about 3 minutes. Sprinkle with parsley and arrange on heated plates.

Fields of greens

Combining starchy ingredients, like rice or couscous, with vegetables and fruits makes a complete, healthy and delicious meal, great for those lighter meals you need to counterbalance the yontef feast.

Peachy accent to Greens Salad.

FIELD OF GREENS SALAD
(Foodland Ontario)

12 cups assorted greens (spinach boston, leaf, arugula, oak, romaine)
2 cups sliced peeled blanched peaches (some may be nectarines or plums or canned if necessary)
½ cup sprigs of fresh herbs (thyme, tarragon, basil, marjoram)

Vinaigrette

1/3 cup extra virgin olive oil
2 tbsp kosher white vinegar
1 clove garlic, crushed
1 tsp finely chopped fresh tarragon
½ tsp each, salt and granulated sugar
¼ tsp black pepper

Tear greens into bite-size pieces. In large mixing bowl, combine greens, peaches, plums or nectarines and herbs. (May be assembled without fruit the night before; add fruit just before tossing with dressing.)

Vinaigrette: In food processor and using steel blade, combine oil, vinegar, garlic, tarragon, salt, sugar and pepper. Pour into jar and refrigerate for up to 2 weeks. Toss salad, with dressing.

Spoon onto serving platter and serve at once.

(Serves 4 to 6)

COUSCOUS WITH APRICOTS PINE NUTS AND GINGER

1 cup instant couscous
½ cup water
1 cup fresh orange juice
¼ cup light olive oil cider vinegar
8 dried apricots, thinly sliced (about ¼ cup)
1 tbsp. dried currants
1 tbsp. golden raisins
2 tsp. grated fresh ginger
salt to taste
½ cup finely diced red onion
2 tbsp. pine nuts, toasted

Pour couscous grains into small mixing bowl. Combine water, orange juice, olive oil and two tablespoons of vinegar in medium saucepan. Bring liquid to a boil and stir in dried fruit, ginger and ½ teaspoon salt. Pour immediately over couscous. Cover and let sit for 20 minutes.

Bring a small pot of water to boil and drop in red onions for 15 seconds. Drain well; toss onion with a few splashes of vinegar to draw out its pink color. When couscous is ready, gently fluff with fork and add pine nuts and onion. Season with salt and additional splash of vinegar to brighten flavor.

(Serves 4)

Serve cool

BULGUR SALAD

4 cups water
2 cups bulgur
1 cup chopped pecans
salt, pepper to taste
1 cup dried currants
4 tbsp. chopped parsley
½ cup diced red pepper
1 tbsp. olive oil
grated peel of lemon

In large pan combine water and bulgur. Bring to boil, reduce heat and simmer covered for 35-40 minutes or until water is absorbed and wheat is tender but not mushy. Transfer to bowl, refrigerate uncovered until cool. Add remaining ingredients and toss thoroughly. Serve cool or at room temperature.

HEALTHFUL, DELICIOUS DAIRY AND FISH

Three generations ago, Harry and Faye Daiter opened the family's first modest dairy and cheese store in Kensington Market. Among the quality products offered in that first store was a tasty, low-fat cheese which would, in time, make Daiter's famous. That low-fat cheese is Lana Brand; only the name has changed.

Family partners Ron and Rene, and their sons Joel and Stephen Daiter, are carrying on Harry and Faye's tradition of selling healthful, delicious dairy and fish products. This tradition has a bright future: among a generation that is more health-conscious than any before, these products are more popular than ever.

Lana Low-Fat Cheese(1/2%) — truly a brand worth remembering — is smooth, tasty and creamy-white. It's great on a bagel with lox, surrounded by fresh fruit, in a vegetable salad — or simply on a spoon by itself. "I even know people who have baked with it," says Rene. Other delicious, healthful Lana products are 0.5% skim-milk yogurt, 14% sour cream, 3.5% table yogurt and 2% cottage cheese.

In 1981, the Daiter family opened the Smoked Fish Factory to serve the needs of their stores, which at that time accounted for 90% of the smoked fish Daiter's sold. This branch of the business has grown immensely, to a point where Daiter's sell only one percent of the smoked fish through their stores; the rest is outside sales to hotels, restaurants and caterers, including export.

After 15 years, the Smoked Fish Factory has built its own reputation for quality. The Factory specializes in smoked salmon, Sockeye, Coho and Atlantic; and Rene is very proud of their new salmon product, Gravlox, which is delicious with Lana low-fat cheese. The barbecued salmons are famous at parties.

There is a full line of hot smoked products: carp, cisco, chub, whitefish chunks, whole whitefish, salmon snack, sable, goldeye and mackerel. The Smoked Fish Factory also offers rainbow trout and smoked herring; and a brand-new item on the list is mackerel fillet, pepper or plain.

The Smoked Fish Factory is a Quality Management Program plant under Department of Fisheries supervision. "We have a rating of A-1," says Rene; "and the Department's standards are very high." Try Smoked Fish Factory products, and you will taste the difference right away.

There are no additives or preservatives in Daiter's dairy and fish products. Also, Daiter's is proud to be kosher, under strict Congress supervision. Lana Low-Fat Cheese is COR number 189D; all Smoked Fish Factory products are COR 7.

For more information, Rene invites you to "call us at Daiter's: Joel 781-6101 and Roman 787-5913."

King Solomon's Table unveils splendid new 300-seat facility next week

If you think there's nothing new under the sun, you obviously haven't seen the brand new Glatt Kosher King Solomon's Table at 3705 Chesswood Drive.

Under strict supervision of the Kashruth Council, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (C.O.R.), King Solomon's features its own permanent Kosher kitchen and a distinguished, elegantly-panelled dining room of some 6,000 square feet that allows it to accommodate simchas of up to 300 guests with ease. For wedding receptions, bar/bat mitzvah parties, anniversaries, sheva brachot, and other important occasions, it makes a striking setting that your guests will remember for its dignity, not its ostentation.

This understated elegance makes it a natural for business functions, and its location (northeast corner of Sheppard and Chesswood) means it's an ultraconvenient destination for any type of gathering. With immediate proximity to both Highway 401 and the Allen Road, King Solomon's is a five to fifteen minute drive from virtually anywhere in north Toronto.

While simchas are the prime focus of King Solomon's on-site catering division, family dining is the raison d'être of the full-service restaurant. The menu features some dishes so appealing that you may wish to impose a "statute of limitations" on any immediate dietary plans. For example, from the extensive (eight choices) pasta menu, the Mongolian Fire Chicken in Pasta will definitely "fire you up" with its flat long pasta tossed with blackened chicken with ancho chili garlic and mushroom sauce. The entrée menu features several fascinating choices which are quantum leaps from your standard restaurant fare. The Jurassic Park B.B.Q. Back Ribs are guaranteed to quell any monster appetite, while the Beef Pizziola (medallions of tender beef sautéed in a roasted garlic, oregano, white wine and fresh tomato sauce) will satisfy the culinary artiste in you. If your dining pleasures lean towards the Orient, you'll be wonderfully served by the delectable General Tsao Chicken (all the rage everywhere now, but you haven't tasted anyone's until you've tasted King Solomon's), Spicy Szechuan Orange Beef, and Honey Chili Chicken. Watch for daily specials!

If you're a serious Chinese food lover, you'll gravitate towards the 22-item All-You-Can-Eat Chinese Dinner Buffet, which for only $17.95 per person ($19.95 Sundays and holidays, $9.95 for children age 10 and under) allows you to navigate the entire spectrum of Chinese cuisine to your heart's (and stomach's) content.

For dinner reservations please call King Solomon's Table at (416) 630-0666. For catering please call Joanne Katz at (416) 630-0303.

More than just a logo, this truly is the meaning behind every Chai Kosher Poultry product. Now into its 9th year in operation, this family owned and operated plant knows of the quality consumers want and entail strict and supervised procedures to provide it.

Under the direct supervision of the Kashruth Council of Toronto (COR), its staff of 57 includes 4 schochtim (slaughterers) and 3 mashgichim (Kashruth supervisors). As well, poultry prepared under Lubavitch auspices also comes from Chai Kosher.

Chai in Quality ...

Being the only kosher processing plant in Ontario, Chai provides over 7,000 birds a day to the kosher market across Canada.

The diligent and caring staff, from the schochtim to the packagers, with the watchful eyes of both the veterinarian staff of the Federal Government and the highly trained mashgichim of the COR, ensure that only the best in kosher reach each table.

Chai in Taste ...

The entire kosher process provides a tastier product. Only ice cold water is used during the processing of the birds as opposed to scalding hot water used in non-kosher entities. This ice cold water seals in the natural juices and tenderness of the birds, whereas the hot water boils most of it out. For further koshering, the birds are soaked for a minimum of 32 minutes, salted for 1 hour and again soaked in ice cold water for 30 minutes to rinse off the excess salt. The process, with the dual supervision, ensures that these poultry products are 100% kosher, all year round, including Passover.

Chai in Style ...

From chickens, turkeys, cornish hens, stewing hens and ducks, Chai has it all. Most recently, due to the overwhelming popularity and demand, chicken and turkey burgers, kebabs and stir-fry have been added to the Chai line.

Chai delivers daily to neighbourhood chain stores, including Perl's Meats, Sunnybrook, Food City, Dominion-Save-A-Centre, Highland Farms, Loblaws, Super Centre, Price Chopper and No Frills. Many kosher butcher shops, including Hartman's, Kosher Meats and Treats, Hamilton Kosher in Hamilton, United Kosher in Ottawa and Aviv Kosher Meats in Vancouver, also carry Chai products.

Chai to You ...

Currently, health conscious consumers are turning towards more healthy, low-fat food. With this in mind, it is comforting to know that Chai provides high quality, conveniently packaged kosher poultry, prepared under the highest standards of kashruth and cleanliness.

Dominion Means Fresh and Dominion Means Kosher!

Dominion Save a Centre is gearing up for Rosh Hashanah with a full assortment of kosher and holiday products.

Bill Sheine, vice-president of marketing for the parent company, The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company (A&P), says that Miracle Food Mart (now Dominion Save a Centre) was the first supermarket chain in Ontario to sell kosher meat and the tradition continues with fresh, high quality kosher meat and specialty products. "We've always tried to meet the needs of our kosher customers."

Finest quality and selection of kosher meat

All Glatt kosher fresh beef and fresh veal sold by Dominion comes from Agri Processors in Iowa. The large cuts of meat are cut to specification at Lazar Yitzchok, a federally approved Glatt processing facility. It is inspected and approved by the Kashruth council of Toronto (COR 369).

Dominion's Glatt kosher meats are cut fresh under the supervision of a Mashgiach and sent daily to Dominion stores at Viewmount & Bathurst, Bathurst & Steeles, Sheppard & Bathurst, and Don Mills & Steeles. Staff is always pleased to take personal orders for that special roast for the holidays or any other special cut desired. Ken Duff, now the seafood director, but previously assistant director of meats says that "Iowa beef costs more but we are willing to give the customers what they want."

Kosher poultry available in a variety of cuts

Kosher poultry, fresh daily under the supervision of the Kashruth Council of Toronto (COR 218) is available at the same stores in a wide variety and selection of quality poultry cuts prepared under the strictest standards of Kashruth and cleanliness. "Freshness is one of the things that differentiates us from the competition."

Freshness also applies to the Dominion produce section, with counter after counter of fresh domestic as well as imported fruits and vegetables. From the tropics come ugli fruit, plantain bananas, pineapples, mangoes and coconuts. Cactus pears are a treat flown in from South Africa, and from Italy come delicious blood oranges. With apple varieties such as Mutsu, Royal Gala, Granny Smith, Delicious and McIntosh, there is sure to be one to suit the apple afficionado. "We have our own produce buyers in each region from which we buy and they work primarily at the fields. With 1100 stores across North America, we have major buying power and we purchase entire fields in order to handle our requirements," says Sheine.

Master Choice line sets new standard of excellence

Introduced four years ago, the in-house Master Choice line includes a plethora of premium quality products guaranteed to excite buyers who want the very best. The line includes a large number of kosher products such as soft drinks, chips, cookies, and sorbet-ice creams. Master Choice is sold by all A&P supermarkets in both the United States and Canada, and by Miracle, Ultra-Mart and Dominion Stores in Canada.

The people at Dominion know that quick, kosher meals are a requirement for the busy working family and it offers prepared foods such as Chai frozen barbeque chickens, Empire pizzas, a wide range of Tabachnik soups, Perl's meat pies, Aaron's cold cuts, and Israeli packaged seafood specialty items. Even salad and stir fries are a snap with precut shredded carrots, broccoli slaw, garden salad or broccoli pieces.

Sheine says that "maintaining a loyal customer base is of utmost importance to us, and earning that loyalty depends on how well you satisfy the needs of customers. Everybody wants a piece of the grocery business but they can't compete with us on variety, freshness and service."

Award-winning wines happen to be kosher

Kosher wine need not be sweet, and Herzog wines prove that with a number of award winning, world-class wines that just happen to be kosher.

In recognition of its first-class wine, Herzog won two special gold medals, four gold medals and 15 silver medals in some 1996 competitions. The Taster's Guild International, San Diego National Wine, Wine Lover's International and New World International Wine, among others, all recognized Herzog for its great wine.

In Ontario, a number of wines are listed with the LCBO. From California is the soft and easy to drink "Baron Herzog Gamay", with light garnet color and a raspberry aroma, and the light and refreshing "Baron Herzog White Zinfandel", a rosé wine. Also from California is "Herzog - Late Harvest Johannesburg Riesling", a ripe and concentrated, subtly scented dessert wine, "Baron Herzog Sauvignon Blanc", a dry, fresh and distinctive medium-bodied wine and "Baron Herzog Chenin Blanc", a nicely balanced wine, slightly sweet and crisp.

From France is the "Herzog Selection Cabernet Sauvignon", a light and delicately styled wine with a soft flavour and smooth finish, and from Israel is the "Givon-French Colombard", a dry crisp wine. New York State features "Kedem Cream White", a sweet white wine acclaimed for its mellow nature and "Kedem Cream Red", a medium sweet, low alcohol, smooth red wine. From Italy is "Bartenura Hazelnut Liqueur", made from Piedmont hazelnuts blended with infusions of mixed berries from the woods.

Herzog wine experts recommend that white wine be served chilled and they offer these guidelines: If serving a white or sweet wine, put it in the fridge for several hours before your meal. Fifteen minutes before you plan to serve it, take the bottle out of the fridge in order to take some of the chill off the wine. Overchilling can smother a wine's bouquet and cheat everyone of enjoying its full character. A sparkling wine, however, should be in the fridge and not taken out until it is about to be opened. The chill enhances the crispness and fruitness of a sparkling wine and it makes the bubbles last longer.

Red wine, in general, should be served at room temperature, but a cool room, about the temperature of a basement. This guideline, they say, comes from Europe where some homes do not have central heat. If wine is kept in a cool room in the basement, bring the bottle upstairs, minutes before serving it. This temperature brings out the best in a red wine; it lets the wine's flavors remain without the edge found when it is warm. If you are planning to uncork a light red, chill it in the fridge for about 30 minutes. Rosés , on the other hand, should be treated like a white wine and should be chilled for several hours in the fridge, then removed 15 minutes before serving.

They stress that the exact temperature in which to serve wine is a personal taste and wine drinkers should experiment a bit to find just the right temperature for their favorite wine.

Shaarei Tefillah offers delicious kosher food

Plan to have your next simchah at Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue and you can look forward to bright, newly renovated surroundings, good service and delicious kosher food.

The recently renovated dining hall, which holds up to 300 people is a study in elegance with a new ceiling complete with recessed tiles, classic chandeliers set in bulk heads and new pot lights. The walls are adorned with lights and two new windows and the dance floor is hardwood. "We've completely brightened up the room," says Bob Manheimer, chairman of the catering committee.

Rose Lazar, who has been caterer at the synagogue for more then five years has been in the business 32 years. As well as Shaarei Tefillah, she works at Beth Torah and Lodzer synagogues and caters to private parties for over 25 people. "Everyone comes to me with a budget and I am very careful to try to stick to it while still giving them the very best."

As a meat and pareve caterer, Lazar prepares everything from the newest southwestern grilled chicken and vegetables with salsa to traditional menus. "The younger generation likes to experiment with new types of dishes such as Polynesian or TexMex," says son David Lazar, "but an older crowd likes to eat the food they grew up with such as brisket and roast chicken. Many even ask for kishka. We are very aware of cooking as low fat as possible, but if people want kishka we give it to them. We can accommodate everyone. We are totally flexible."

Clients can choose from about 50 standardized menus and the Lazars are always open to suggestions. "We also prepare specialized meals such as vegetarian, salt-free – we've even done a tofu dish. As for our baking, most is done on the premises. Delicacies such as chocolate or lemon mousse, strudels and chelsea buns are a favorite of everyone."

David Lazar advises that the first thing to do when planning a simchah is to book the hall, "because an experienced caterer can help from there. People have booked bar mitzvahs with us up to the year 2000. We work with entertainment consultants and can recommend a florist, photographer, orchestra or videographer. We also have tablecloths and napkins in an array of colors so we are able to accommodate any color scheme. We do our best for our clients."

Kosher Vegicaps® On Market

TORONTO, Canada: August 1996

Wampole Canada Inc. is introducing a new line of herbal nutritional supplements which are made with Vegicaps, a two-piece, vegetable-based capsule. Made from vegetable cellulose, Vegicaps are free from preservatives and all animal products (no pork or beef). Wampole is the only pharmaceutical company in Canada to offer vegetable-based capsules for the pharmacy market.

President, Aubrey Dan stated, "There is a growing trend among consumers to take control of their own health and to act in a pro-active, responsible manner. We know that there is a need for an alternative to gelatine capsules to satisfy customers who wish to avoid animal products for dietary, health, or religious reasons. We decided to take the lead in offering this alternative to the Canadian public."

The new line of twenty herbal supplements includes products such as Echinacea, Ginkgo Biloba, Saw Palmetto, Odourless Garlic, Red Korean Ginseng and Siberian Ginseng. All ingredients are certified Montreal (MK) Kosher.

Aubrey Dan notes that, "Working with the Rabbis to help Wampole become Kosher has been wonderful. We have been collaborating closely with Rabbi Jaffe from Montreal as well as Rabbi Faiglestock and Rabbi Teitlebaum in Vancouver who are interested in seeing more Kosher products in the market place".

Wampole is the first Canadian Company to be certified Kosher, not just for the new line of herbal supplements, but also for vitamins, minerals and OTC products–the complete product line, excluding those few produced in soft gel capsules.

Most competitive products on the market are available in gelatine capsules. Vegicaps are not as susceptible to microbiological growth as are gelatine capsules and do not melt or become brittle with environmental changes. Vegicaps break down and dissolve easily and because they are produced from plant fibre, they do not interfere with normal digestive processes.

Wampole is introducing new packaging with the launch of these herbal products. Gone is the white plastic bottle, regarded by consumers as synthetic and clinical, to be replaced by an amber bottle with a distinctive purple cap. This new packaging reflects the naturalness and high quality of the products. Aubrey Dan added, "We undertook research before introducing the new products to ensure that the product packaging would represent what we want the Wampole brand to stand for a quality brand which consumers can trust."

Rodier's vivid colour palate invigorates Bayview Village

Rodier's 3/4 length cashmere coat: stylish elegance for all occasions

In 1916, the vibrant, luxurious fabric of master weaver Jacques Rodier introduced knitwear to women's clothing, and changed forever the landscape of women's fashion.

Given this legacy, it's only fitting that Rodier's return to Bayview Village should be engineered by Joseph Lugassy, a savvy fashion veteran who pioneered the Rodier line in Toronto by opening six boutiques. He later sold them to pursue other business interests, only to find himself artistically unfulfilled and longing for a return to fashion. With the opening of Rodier in Bayview Village, that void in his life is now filled. Joining him in his new venture is his wife Lea, and both look forward to serving their customers in the fashion-forward environment of Bayview Village.

Though the line's quality and colour palate have always been legendary, it was sometimes perceived as an "older" line. No longer. This season's introduction of bold new styles and younger shapes marks Rodier's re-emergence as a line with universal age appeal.

No less than eight major groupings underscore the diversity of Rodier's Fall '96 collection:

1. Noir et rouge. Classic Rodier at its best: exquisite knit tops, skirts, dresses and coats in unequivocal strong colours.

3. Masculin. In this grouping, featuring dark brown and royal blue, Rodier struts its casual stuff with lycra and wool fabrications and cozy, thick cardigans. Rodier with jeans? An emphatic and elegant "Yes!"

7. Le cocktail. Long dresses and skirts make a singular statement for evening, as does a pure black wool crêpe tuxedo jacket.

8. Vif. Flashy bright yellows and bold brassy blues in wool bouclette two-piece suits, short jackets and tightly-fitted skirts.

Common to all groupings are a fabulous selection of the most luxurious coats this side of heaven. Available in 3/4 length and full length, many feature a mixture of wool, cashmere and angora that is toasty warm and feathery soft to the touch yet full-bodied, draping beautifully in firm, clean lines.

All in all, the Rodier collection paints a compelling picture for Fall '96, and offers many choices for High Holiday dressing. In this vein, the Lugassys welcome you to their store and extend a heartfelt SHANA TOVAH.

FASHION YOU CAN WEAR, AT A COMFORTABLE PRICE

The selection will amaze you at Party City

In just 10 years, with over 165 superstores (across Canada, the U.S., Puerto Rico and Europe), Party City has grown to become the world's largest retailer of party supplies.

On August 26 , Party City opened its 3rd superstore in Canada, on Chrislea Rd. in Vaughan, in addition it its existing Brampton and Mississauga locations. Michael Shneer, President of Party City, Canada, plans to open 50 superstores across Canada within the next 4 years.

What's the secret of this success? With over 20,000 different items in stock per store, Party City offers the largest selection and variety of party goods in Canada with a constant influx of new products. No matter what kind of party you are planning, you will find 'one-stop shopping' for your supplies here.

There are items for children's birthdays, sweet 16's and adult birthdays; for bar and bat mitzvah and graduation parties; for weddings and showers; for wedding anniversaries from the 1st to the 50th. There is a humungous selection of loot bag gifts and party favours for the kids, personalized invitations and thank-you cards.

And then there is the vast selection of hats, horns, banners, pinatas, candles, giftwrap, ribbons, bows and bags; custom-made or ready-made centrepieces and balloon sandweights. There are hundreds of matching patterns and a vast array of decorator colours in paperware and plastic — dishes, cutlery and accessories. Bridal accessories run the gamut from confetti to place cards, from car pompoms to garter belts.

Many items are for general home entertaining, when you throw a party just for fun. There are even theme items for pool or garden parties, etc. There are also items for every holiday and season, secular and religious. For example, Party City also has Canada's largest supply of Hallowe'en costumes, wigs, masks, makeup and accessories, many of which are also suitable for Purim. Catering supplies include platters, various shapes and sizes of foil containers, plastic serving bowls, steam racks and fuel. Besides buying cake decorating products here, you can even take lessons in cake decorating!

Much of Party City's stock, including balloons and decorations are available in nearly every size, colour and quantity that one can think of. You can rent helium tanks, or have your balloons filled in the superstore. Shneer emphasizes "we sell a dozen helium filled latex balloons for only $7.99 while other stores charge as much as $12.99 a dozen for the same product."

To quantity and variety, add price as another success factor. Party City is a discount superstore with a lowest price guarantee policy and promises to beat the advertised price of a competitor's product by 15%. As a general rule, Party City tries to keep its prices 30-50% lower than that of its competitors. For example, Shneer comments "we carry many of the same personalized invitation books as others have for wedding or Bar/Bat Mitzvah invitations, but we discount the invitation prices quoted in the book by 30%.

"With so many Party City superstores and the huge number and variety of items we sell," explains Shneer, "we earn huge volume discounts from our suppliers — and pass the savings directly on to the customer."

Another success factor is customer service. Party City has free party planning checklists to make it easier for you to plan what you need. Staff are 'mavens' on the merchandise available; they are enthusiastic, knowledgeable and helpful, giving the customer all the time and assistance needed to make their choices. This approach has built tremendous customer loyalty and repeat business from word-of-mouth referrals.

A state-of-the-art computerized inventory tracking system enables Party City to respond quickly to changing consumer preferences and assists in decisions as to the variety of merchandise which should be available at each store. The shelves are kept fully stocked at all times and are continuously replenished.

Party City superstores are bright, clean and spacious. They are designed to exude a festive atmosphere, and convey a feeling of excitement; when you step in the door of a Party City superstore, what you see will amaze you! "We want you to have fun shopping at Party City," says Shneer, "and to tell your friends what an exciting shopping experience it is."

Each location is chosen so that the superstore is easily accessible and will draw the attention of new customers. Party City's three Toronto locations are: 4 Kennedy Rd. S. in Brampton, (905) 457-4606; 1225 Dundas St. E. in Mississauga, (905) 275-3799; and the new Vaughan superstore, at 156 Chrislea Rd., right across from the Price Club, at Hwy. 400 and Hwy. 7, (905) 856-2125.

Selection + Service = Success

Since opening its store at Yonge & Steeles in 1979, Bronson's China and Gifts has thrived on selection and service. Last fall, Bronson's tested a midtown location at Lawrence Plaza with an outlet store. Customers were not satisfied with the outlet style and asked for a full service store similar to the Yonge & Steeles location. After closing the outlet to renovate and re-merchandise, the new store was opened in Lawrence Plaza this past June.

Bronson's selection accommodates every budget and taste. "We show clients they can make tasteful choices, yet stay within budget," says owner Ilene Bronsteter.

There is a full range of quality dinnerware, flatware, stemware, glassware, giftware and accessories, both traditional and contemporary. Stock is constantly updated: computerized inventory ensures prompt service; and Bronson's offers free gift wrapping and same day delivery.

"These are customer-oriented stores," Ilene adds. The atmosphere is relaxed, encouraging customers to browse and choose at leisure. Bronson's offers a matching price policy, and a new "Points" program given for every purchase. Bronson's also offers one of Canada's best bridal registries, centrally computerized for both locations, and owes much of its business to referrals from brides across Canada.

Bronson's main store at 2 Steeles Ave. West, is open Monday to Saturday 9:30 a.m. to 6 p.m., Thursday to 9 p.m and Sunday 12 noon to 5 p.m. (905) 881-9930.

Mephisto: health, comfort and style on an equal footing

It's trite but true: before you see the face of someone you know, you often recognize him or her by the way he or she walks. Each of us has a recognizable gait, as distinctive as face or fingerprints. Mephisto footwear is created with this fact in mind.

Although we often take walking for granted, it's a remarkable, complex process which bears thinking about. Thousands of times a day, we put one foot forward, lean forward from the hip and extend the knee, then balance our body weight on this leg so the other can carry out a corresponding motion .... all this to take one single step!

The foot, with its 26 different bones, most of them quite small, bears the weight of your entire body. Moreover, important nerve connections link it with other body organs, so it stands to reason that the health of your feet affects your overall health.

Usually, we walk without consciously thinking about it; but because your feet probably spend two-thirds or more of each day enclosed in shoes, buying footwear deserves careful reflection. If you want shoes designed and crafted according to the best scientific knowledge available, Mephisto is for you.

Mephisto shoes, boots and sandals are made entirely from high-quality leather, rubber, cork and other natural materials. Not only are they durable and attractively styled, they also shape themselves to your feet and your gait. Every model incorporates a latex foam midsole for soft, tireless walking, latex padding to protect heel and joints from pressure and rubbing, and a leather inner sock.

Mephisto offers footwear for every purpose, casual or formal: hiking or strolling, camping or dining out, working or relaxing at home. Most models incorporate an air cushion sole with maximum grip, a shock absorbing heel, and padded toplines and tongues; and those with laces are quick to undo and do up, fitting the shape of your foot without cramping it. Many models feature Gore-Tex lining to keep water out while letting your foot "breathe".

Mephisto's Air-Jet, Runoff, Travels and City Hikers lines have a patented Air-Jet circulation system to keep your feet fresh. The sandals and Mobils lines feature an orthopedic footbed, which is removable in the Mobils, and a massage zone which tones muscles and stimulates blood circulation; the Mobils also feature a removable insole.

While popular in their native France, Mephisto shoes find 85% of their market in Europe, North America and Asia. They are worn by many celebrities, and gaining popularity in leaps and bounds. In Toronto, you will find them at two Mephisto Boutiques: 1177 Yonge St. at Summerhill, (416) 968-7026; and 50 Bloor St. West, Concourse level, (416) 966-2568.

Singles Registry — Over 1100 Members Strong

With new members registering in record numbers it has been an exciting summer at the Jewish Singles Registry. That's the word from director Rob Singer who credits "word of mouth" advertising as playing a key role in the success; as current members tell their friends how fast and easy it is to connect with other Jewish singles. Membership has now surpassed the 1100 member mark.

The Choice is Yours

At the J.S.R., there is an implicit understanding of how hard it is to meet interesting people. Your job takes up a lot of time, bar hopping is not your scene, and blind dates just don't do it for you anymore. This is where the Jewish Singles Registry comes in — an attractive way to meet interesting and exciting people. Here you are given the opportunity to be pro-active, to take control of your love life, and to meet people that you want to meet. After reviewing detailed and comprehensive biography profiles, complete with photographs one gets a clear and concise picture of what your potential date will be like. You also have the freedom to be the selector, selectee, or both. So whether you are looking for someone to share a cup of coffee and a good conversation, or that special individual to possibly take a walk down the aisle, the J.S.R. makes it fun, safe and simple for you to make informed and quality dating choices. What more can you ask for?

Another Engagement

The J.S.R. is delighted to report that another Registry couple has recently announced their intentions to get married. In fact the system is so successful that the Registry averages an engagement every 6 weeks. With membership growing at such a quick pace that average is expected to improve even more by the end of this year.

Guaranteed Service

What sets the Jewish Singles Registry apart from all other services is that you can join the J.S.R. virtually risk free. Members get to go on as many dates as they wish throughout the year (providing that both individuals have said yes) and are guaranteed a minimum of 10 dates within the first year of their membership, or they stay in the service for free. You may call the J.S.R. office for more details.

Time To Register

At the Registry we know how important it is to find someone to talk to and laugh with and share life's ups and downs. We recognize how difficult it is to meet that special individual. Greektown in Thornhill adds flavour to the Community ... with its wonderful cuisine

Since it opened in April, The Friendly Greek, with its outdoor patio and its decor reminiscent of an island in the Aegean Sea, has brought to Thornhill a little piece of the Danforth. A restaurant, however, does not live by atmosphere alone; and the long-term success of The Friendly Greek will rest on its excellent cuisine and friendly service.

Even before you step inside, the work done to beautify the setting shows you that The Friendly Greek is here to stay. At one corner of the blue-and-white building is a tower with murals of Greek scenes. The area near the entrance is paved with cobblestone bricks, and landscaped with a waterfall. For guests waiting to go in, there are benches as well.

The inside is spacious, decorated in soft colors, with a huge skylight of blue and white glass. Under the skylight is a quiet fountain, where guests may toss a coin to make a wish. The Friendly Greek is wheelchair accessible; and the tables are set wide apart. "We could put 20 more tables in," says partner Mike Karageorgiou; "but we like our patrons to feel comfortable."

As you wait to be seated, you notice a tank with startlingly bright yellow and blue fish from the Red Sea. There are murals here too; they, like those on the tower, are the work of an artist whom the Greek community knows simply as Peter. There is bright stained glass, with some three-dimensional panes; and the two fireplaces, in cooler weather, will warm body and soul with gas or wood fires.

Hostess Mariana Stefanidis shows you to your table with a smile; the name "Friendly Greek" is apt, for the smiles are sincere. As partner Gregory Stefanidis says: "It's easy to smile when you earn your living from what you love doing." During your meal, your waiter will come at once if you need anything; and Chef Michael Nikiforos may come out to ask how you are enjoying the products of his art.

The family partnership which has spent so much effort on ambience devotes even more attention to cuisine and service. Mike emphasizes that a restaurant is a full-time business; this includes much time spent with the patrons, on the alert for ways to improve service.

Chef Nikiforos, with 36 years' experience as a cook, sets high standards in the foods he works with, and how he prepares them. Not only is everything fresh: the staff of the Friendly Greek do all the preparation themselves, right down to peeling the potatoes. Only the cakes are brought in, from the high-quality La Rocca Bakery.

Generous portions and moderate prices are the rule. For example, the Roast Lamb Dinner (Ofto Kleftico) is only $9.95; the Combo Souvlaki Dinner (which includes two pieces each of chicken, beef and lamb), only $10.95; Pikilia (a combination of three cold appetizers) is $7.25; and the children's menu starts at $2.95.

Two or three appetizers – say, Taramosalata (caviar), humos and eggplant salad – make a light but satisfying summer lunch. If you want something more substantial, the entrees are served with potatoes and Greek salad; the Roast Lamb Dinner, for example, includes rice, garlic bread and tzatziki. The Greek salad is huge, with crisp lettuce and fresh tomatoes; the lemon potatoes are tangy; and the lamb is tender and succulent (and prepared oil-free).

There is a large selection of red and white wines, most of them Greek. With most of the dinners served at The Friendly Greek, Mike recommends dry white wines, especially Kouros. For dessert, try a generous serving of honey-rich baklava, its flavor made more enticing with bay leaves and a hint of orange juice.

After only four months, The Friendly Greek already has plenty of regular patrons, including families. The partners are enthusiastic community supporters; they support the Willowdale Grizzlies baseball team, and are looking for a hockey team to sponsor. In December, during the festive seasons, the money in the fountain will be donated to a charity.

The children's menu, incidentally, is a color-me-in menu; the Friendly Greek supplies the crayons. This is one of many touches of generosity which make this a special place. If you have a birthday, for example, the cake is on the house; and the waiters sing Happy Birthday.

The Friendly Greek, at 7315 Yonge St. just a few blocks north of Steeles, is also available for parties. There is ample parking; drop in, or call (905) 707-8579.

Foundation helps sufferers of incontinence

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A leaky bladder is no laughing matter, but after lawyer Donna Latch (a pseudonym) gave birth to her second child, her bladder leaked every time she laughed.

It also leaked when she sneezed, coughed, walked quickly or did aerobics and she began to curtail those activities as much as possible. Latch, 43, who began suffering from stress incontinence 13 years ago, was a panelist at the first annual meeting of the Simon Foundation for Continence, Canada, held recently in Toronto.

The Simon Foundation is a national non-profit organization dedicated to helping people with problems of urinary incontinence. The 10-year-old foundation has a toll-free number (1-800-265-9575) that provides information and support. It also helps Canadians locate incontinence professionals in their own communities.

According to the foundation's statistics, more than one million Canadians have some form of urinary incontinence. More women than men suffer from this condition that affects one in every four Canadian women who are past middle age.

According to foundation president Anita Saltmarche, a Toronto nursing consultant specializing in incontinence, these figures are conservative because they are largely based on the number of people seeking treatment.

"It does not necessarily reflect the large numbers of individuals — 11 out of 12 — that go untreated," she told The CJN. "No one has to tolerate urine leakage because it can almost always be effectively treated or managed. It's not a normal part of aging and it's not a normal part of being a woman."

Getting medical attention is very much a subjective matter based on an individual's level of tolerance, said Sender Herschorn, head of urology at Sunnybrook Health Science Centre and a governing board member of the Simon Foundation. "Some people are bothered by a drop. Some are not troubled by a gush."

But it is often difficult to find health professionals who treat incontinence, because there is limited funding for treating the condition, he noted. "Urinary incontinence does not merit the same position as other needs in society."

A panel of three told the group of the difficulties they had faced in seeking specialized health professionals.

Doug Scott, 63, a retired educator, experienced urinary incontinence as a side effect of a surgical procedure for prostate cancer, but was given no information about the condition before or after his operation, he said.

Most of the physicians Latch spoke to about her incontinence did not take her seriously, despite the impact the condition was having on her life, she said. The fear of leakage caused her to lose her self confidence; she stopped working full time and cut back on socializing and many other activities.

But she was "tenacious" and after consulting more than a dozen physicians, she finally found Herschorn. He did a surgical bladder lift last January and her problem has virtually disappeared, she said.

Herschorn said specialized multi-discipline centres for treating incontinence are needed so that people with the condition can get treatment and educational information. He feels the Simon Foundation helps fill the educational gap.

Israel to resume talks with PA shortly: PM

By SARAH HONIG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told members of the Likud's political bureau last week that official talks with the Palestinian Authority will resume soon and will cover a variety of issues, including Hebron.

Netanyahu vehemently denied that he had promised the United States to cease the construction of bypass roads for Israeli settlements in the territories.

The bureau was called into session to discuss the issue of IDF redeployment in Hebron. However, Netanyahu put off the deliberation, but not before a tiff with bureau chair MK Uzi Landau, who also heads the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee.

Netanyahu alluded to the renewed attacks on his government by a host of Arab leaders, when he referred to the "attempt to impose a political siege" on the new government when it first took office in June.

"When we took office we were faced with a concerted attempt by some circles in the Arab world to impose a diplomatic siege upon the new government and upon the State of Israel," he said. "This went so far that the first action we had to take was to break through this siege and to do it as quickly as possible.

"In fact, the aim was to expand this siege in the direction of Europe and the U.S. There was an urgent need to approach the governments in question, as well as Arab leaders, to put an end to this."

Netanyahu told the bureau that international agreements have to be adhered to. He called on the Syrians to continue the talks with Israel.

On Hebron itself, Netanyahu had nothing new to say. He said he cannot as yet bring any plan before the bureau, as "it is too early for this and an unwise thing to do just now."

But a hint of the sort of opposition any plan to redeploy the IDF in Hebron could cause inside the Likud was seen when Landau proposed a resolution making any moves conditional on the Palestinians fully living up to their undertakings and on full reciprocity between the sides.

Landau said he "understands the pressures under which the government is laboring, but the Palestinian violations of their end of the bargain are so deep that they go all the way to the heart of the matter."

When Netanyahu heard of the draft resolution, he reportedly threatened not to attend the bureau session, considering the resolution to be tantamount to placing constraints on the government's freedom to act.

Cabinet Secretary Danny Naveh resolved the matter by convincing Landau to insert a clause stating that the bureau supports the government and its policy on Hebron, so long as the principle of reciprocity is respected.

Foreign workers' future discussed

By DAVID HARRIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – A plan to expel 1,000 illegal foreign workers a month and to eventually send up to 100,000 back to their home countries, was discussed at last week's cabinet meeting.

The proposal by Labor and Social Affairs Minister Eli Yishai, calls for the establishment of an authority and the allocation of several million shekels to deal with the issue.

It was reported last Thursday that Yishai will suggest establishing transit camps to house those awaiting deportation.

It is estimated that at least half of the more than 200,000 foreign workers here are employed illegally, and Yishai intends to target them first.

"No one is defining [all] foreign workers as criminals," said Yishai. "But every worker whose work permit has expired is an illegal worker...and should be removed from the country."

He indicated that a reduction in the number of foreign workers would lead to a further easing of the six-month closure.

During a visit to areas of south Tel Aviv populated by foreign workers, Yishai was told that many of the workers had entered the country on tourist visas, and are now requesting that their families be allowed to join them.

Yishai saw apartments housing up to 18 people per room and expressed concern at the abysmal standard of living. Senior police officers who accompanied him, updated him on the increasing crime rate among the workers, including drunk and disorderly and violent behavior. The proposal to set up transit camps has been welcomed by the police.

Following his tour, which included a visit to a kindergarten for children of foreign workers, Yishai wrote to Health Minister Tzahi Hanegbi, warning him of the possible spread of disease because of the squalid living conditions.

MK Amnon Rubinstein of Meretz vehemently objected to Yishai's expulsion proposals, saying the deportation of tens of thousands of people would seriously damage the country's image abroad. Instead, he said, the government should grant all the workers the right to stay legally for a specific period, on condition that they then leave.

Moscow shul bombed

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW – A bomb blast ripped through a Moscow synagogue last week, causing no injuries but seriously damaging the three-storey building.

"This was clearly an anti-Semitic act," said Berel Lazar, the rabbi at the Lubavitch synagogue and the chair of the Rabbinical Alliance of the Commonwealth of Independent States.

The explosion, caused by a homemade bomb planted outside the synagogue, shattered windows in the building's southern facade and tore off sections of the roof.

The force of the blast knocked over Torah scrolls in the synagogue's ark. The scrolls were not damaged, members of the community said. Windows of neighboring houses also broke.

"This is a terrible act of vandalism," said 72-year-old Vladimir Kutyin, who has lived near the synagogue since childhood.

Kutyin, a veteran who is not Jewish, also said, "I'm ashamed of the Russian people who let such things happen in our country. I fought side by side with many Jews against the Nazis."

The brick synagogue reopened in June, replacing a 70-year-old wooden one that was destroyed in December 1993 by an act of arson.

No one has been charged in connection with that crime.

Moscow Mayor Yuriy Luzhkov, who attended the June opening of the new synagogue, said at the time, "The city authorities will never tolerate the slightest display of inequality or oppression toward the Jews."

Vladimir Porokhov, district police chief, said last Friday that he was determined to capture those responsible for the bombing.

No one has been apprehended in connection with the bombing, said Mark Levin, executive director of the National Conference on Soviet Jewry, in a telephone interview Sunday from Maryland.

Strategically placed

Except for a guard, no one was inside the synagogue at the time of the Aug. 22 bombing, which occurred at night.

Rabbi Lazar said people usually study in the synagogue at night, but on the night of the bombing, many of those people were at a wedding in another part of the city.

The wedding was originally scheduled to take place at the synagogue, Levin said, adding, "Had the wedding not been moved, there would have been serious loss of human life.

"The bomb was strategically placed to do the maximum amount of damage," Levin said.

He said his organization plans to follow up with both U.S. and Russian government officials.

Levin said that during the weekend, U.S. Ambassador to Russia Thomas Pickering visited the damaged synagogue.

The combination of the bombing and the arson fire "puts the Jewish community as a whole in Moscow on edge," Levin said.

"If our parents fought against communism, today we have to fight against hooliganism," Rabbi Lazar said. "The best way to fight it is to show that we are not intimidated by such acts. We will continue to build the Jewish community under any circumstances."

The blast came a day after construction began on a new Jewish community centre, to be located next to the synagogue, the biggest project of its kind being carried out in Russia since the dissolution of the Soviet Union.

The synagogue, located in the Maryina Roshcha section of Moscow, was first built in what used to be a Jewish neighborhood.

The wooden synagogue was constructed on the site where the city's first chassidic house of worship was situated.

JTA staff writer Alissa Kaplan in New York contributed to this report.

Iraq wants to be regional power again

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Economic sanctions have been throttling Iraq since its reckness invasion of Kuwait in August 1990. But as a result of two major agreements with the United Nations (UN) recently, the Iraqi government has reason to believe that the sanctions — which have denied Iraq the ability to market its oil — may not last much longer.

Mideast Analysis

•On June 24, Iraq signed an accord intended to accelerate the long-delayed process of eliminating its conventional, chemical and biological weapons of mass destruction.

•On Aug. 7, the UN gave Iraq permission to sell up to $2 billion (US) worth of oil every six months to alleviate the hardships triggered by the imposition of sanctions (which have impoverished ordinary Iraqis and caused widespread hunger and disease.)

The Iraqi strongman, Saddam Hussein, appears confident that these agreements spell the beginning of the end of the ruinous embargo, which has isolated and weakened Iraq.

Iraq is not the only nation that has called for a lifting or a revision of the sanctions. Arab states such as Saudi Arabia, Syria and Morocco take the view that the embargo has only reinforced Hussein's hold on Iraq, which he rules with an iron hand. Farther afield, France and Russia have argued that the sanctions have outlived their usefulness because Iraq has begun to comply with UN resolutions.

In a limited sense, this is true. Due to international pressures, Iraq no longer claims Kuwait as its 19th province, and has started to dismantle its weapons of mass destruction.

But Iraq has yet to return stolen Kuwaiti property or to account for hundreds of Kuwaitis who disappeared following Iraq's incursion.

More seriously, Iraq continues to conceal important components of its military arsenal.

The pact entered into by Iraq and the UN in June may finally compel Baghdad to come completely clean on this matter. But if the past is any guide, Iraq will cynically attempt to mislead the UN. Since 1992, Iraq has repeatedly given the UN "full, final and complete disclosures" of its weapons programs. But these putative assurances have proven to be exercises in dissimulation. Baghdad has continually deceived the UN Special Commission charged with finishing the task of defanging Iraq.

For example: Iraq heatedly claimed that all its biological weaponry was destroyed in the wake of the 1991 Gulf War. But the defection of Hussein's son-in-law to Jordan a year ago forced Iraq to disclose that it had produced much larger quantities of a certain type of nerve gas than it had previously acknowledged.

This revelation, however, was merely the tip of the iceberg. Rolf Ekeus, chair of the UN Special Commission, has accused Iraq of trying to produce long-range ballistic missiles with the help of prohibited imports. In recent months, the Jordanian authorities have intercepted three shipments of military spare parts disguised as agricultural equipment. More recently, Ekeus accused Iraq of hiding weapons at secret sites on its territory.

The Special Commission has a sophisticated monitoring system in place to detect Iraqi violations of UN resolutions. A team of inspectors has unrestricted access to suspected factories, though in practice this is not always the case. There are helicopter flyovers and high-altitude surveillance flights. In addition, the UN has affixed sensors and video cameras to more than 200 facilities throughout Iraq that could be converted to arms production.

And while this monitoring regime, combined with sanctions, have crippled Iraq's military capabilities, Iraq still maintains one of the most formidable armed forces in the Middle East, according to a study by the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

Despite having been forced to downsize its army since the Gulf War, Iraq has about 400,000 men under arms, 2,200 tanks, 2,500 armored personnel carriers, 1,650 artillery pieces and some 300 combat aircraft.

Clearly, Iraq wants to be a regional power once again, capable of affecting decisions about oil production and pricing, confronting Iran — its traditional enemy — on an equitable basis, and influencing the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Iraq's nuclear program may be the linchpin of its regional ambitions. On the eve of the Gulf War, Iraq was just months away from acquiring an atomic device. Since then, the program has been apparently dismantled. Yet Iraq retains the key assets required to resurrect it, warns the Washington Institute for Near East Policy in a report written by Michael Eisenstadt.

Iraq has a cadre of experienced scientists and technicians, a relatively advanced military-industrial base and a viable nuclear weapon design.

So, if the sanctions are lifted, Saddam Hussein's Iraq may well be in a position to become a full-fledged nuclear power, a scenario that Israel would not and could not tolerate.

Netanyahu may meet with Yasser Arafat

Netanyahu seemed to soften his position regarding such a meeting following the Weizman announcement. Previously Netanyahu had said he would only "consider" such as meeting if he deemed it essential for Israel's security interests.

Weizman's initiative was in response to an urgent request from Arafat to meet with him to revive the talks. He said he had consulted with Netanyahu before deciding to invite Arafat to his private home in Caesaria.

However, the Hebrew daily Yediot Aharanot, which first exposed Weizman's initiative, reported that he had presented Netanyahu with an ultimatum: 'Either you meet Arafat within 10 days – or I will."

At a joint press conference with Netanyahu, Weizman denied he had issued an ultimatum, but said: "Whether we like it or not, Arafat is the first Palestinian leader in 100 years who can be credited with a political achievement. He has control of more than two million Palestinians. He is our neighbor. He sits among us. When a leader like this...asks to see me, I think I must agree to his request."

Weizman forces PM's hand

Netanyahu justified his own refusal to meet Arafat, explaining that "if and when such a meeting takes place, I want to make sure that it is substantive and not just ceremonial. The days of declarations are over."

He said his government had a mandate to run negotiations differently than the previous administration. "We are going to make sure that the interests of both sides are served," he said, repeating his demand that the Palestinians implement their side of the agreement before either party assumes new obligations. "I was not elected to be prime minister of the Palestinians."

Weizman, whose position as head of state is purely ceremonial, cannot engage in substantive negotiations. However, the president, through his flamboyant personality and centrist political views, has turned his position into one of symbolic and moral clout. He used it to reprimand the Rabin and Peres governments for proceeding too hastily with peace talks and has now discretely criticized Netanyahu for dragging his feet in negotiations.

Likud MKs call for end to stalemate

While one newspaper editorial criticized the president for stepping outside the bounds of his authority, most pundits and politicians supported him.

"The president is the seismograph of the nation," said former president Chaim Herzog. "In making his move, the president wasn't just acting on his own behalf – he was representing the public."

"He can't be expected to stand on the side like some neutral boy scout," said Labor MK Binyamin Ben-Eliezer.

Presidential pressure was not the only factor that may have moderated Netanyahu's stance. The Palestinian Authority confirmed on Sunday that it had closed down three offices operating illegally in Jerusalem, thus meeting one of Netanyahu's conditions for resuming talks. Several Likud Members of Knesset also issued blunt calls to Netanyahu to meet with Arafat immediately and end the stalemate.

"Stop playing games," urged Likud MK Meir Shetreet. "It's time to meet Arafat and advance the negotiations. This is critical and there is no point in delaying it further," he said, adding that the prime minister had been elected on a mandate to continue the peace talks.

"The government is robbing Arafat of power and public support instead of strengthening his hand," charged Likud MK Gideon Ezra, a former deputy director of the General Security Service.

"To do what we want him to do, Arafat must have support among his people. The government must give the Palestinian Authority something substantial if it wants to realize its own goals," he said.

Arafat has already met with two members of the Netanyahu administration – the PM's advisor Dore Gold and Foreign Minster David Levy. But neither meeting was substantive.

Weizman's move came in response to a request by Arafat, who in recent weeks, has been staging a public relations campaign directed at Israel, stressing the desperate state of the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

In meetings with opposition members and in appearances on Israeli media – including his first interview on Israel Television – Arafat said the closure of the territories has driven the Palestinians to the brink of starvation. That, combined with Israel's failure to redeploy troops in Hebron, has badly eroded morale and could drive Palestinians to desperate acts, he warned.

Last week, a member of the PLO executive committee, Mahmoud Abbas, claimed that radical Palestinian groups, supported by Iran, were plotting to overthrow Arafat and the Palestinian Authority.

PA shuts down Jerusalem offices

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – The Palestinian Authority (PA) has closed down several offices operating in eastern Jerusalem.

Israel had maintained that the presence of the offices was a violation of the self-rule accords.

Palestinian officials said Sunday that they included the offices of geography and cartography and the offices of youth and sport. A statistics office was shut down by the PA last week.

Israel has been demanding the closures as a precondition to resuming talks on the redeployment of Israeli troops from most of the West Bank town of Hebron.

The redeployment is called for under the Interim Agreement signed by Israel and the Palestinians last September, but the move, scheduled for late March, was postponed after a series of suicide bombings in Israel earlier this year.

PA official Nabil Shaath said there were no offices run by the authority operating in Jerusalem.

He said Shimon Peres, who at the time was foreign minister, had given assurances that Palestinian institutions operating in eastern Jerusalem before the establishment of the self-rule government in 1994 would be allowed to remain open.

U.S. neo-Nazi convicted of distributing hate material

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK – American neo-Nazi Gary Lauck has been convicted of illegally distributing hate propaganda in Germany and sentenced to four years in prison.

The state court in Hamburg, Germany, last week found Lauck, 43, guilty of inciting racial hatred and distributing propaganda of organizations that violate the German Constitution.

Lauck heads the National Socialist German Workers' Party-Foreign Organization, a name derived from the official title of Adolf Hitler's party. Lauck has said his group is heir to the Nazi party and that Hitler was "too humane."

After the verdict was announced, Lauck shouted, "The fight will go on!" According to news reports, he also yelled in German, "Neither the communists nor the Nazis ever dared to kidnap an American citizen!"

The Anti-Defamation League hailed the conviction.

"While we are gratified that Gary Lauck of Lincoln, Neb., whom ADL dubbed the 'Farm Belt Fuhrer' several years ago, will be spending the next four years in a German prison, we are disappointed that the court did not impose the five-year prison term demanded by the prosecution," said Abraham Foxman, ADL national director.

"Nevertheless, Lauck's conviction and sentencing puts all neo-Nazis around the world on notice that their anti-Semitic and racist hate propaganda will not be tolerated by a democratic Germany," Foxman added.

Lauck's lawyer pledged to appeal the case and said his client's actions were legal under U.S. constitutional guarantees of free speech.

But pro-Hitler, anti-Jewish publications that deny that the Holocaust occurred are illegal in Germany.

Lauck was arrested on an international warrant from Germany when he attended a March 1995 neo-Nazi convention in Denmark. He was extradited in September to Germany on the basis of an obscure Danish law that bans racist statements.

The prison time he has served since March 1995 was deducted from his sentence.

Israeli minister criticizes reported Jordan, Syria dam

By DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Agriculture Minister Rafael Eitan has sharply criticized a reported proposal by Jordan and Syria to jointly construct a dam on the upper reaches of the Yarmuk River.

Eitan said that if the report was correct and the plan went ahead, it would constitute a breach of regional water agreements, including those contained in the peace treaty between Israel and Jordan. Under the accord, Israel is supposed to give Jordan 30 million cubic metres of water a year from Lake Kinneret.

He warned that if Syria and Jordan were the only ones to benefit from the reported project, the government would have to reconsider water agreements with Jordan.

He said that if Israel were to get its share of the water from the dam project, he would have no objections to the plan. But he maintained that it is highly unlikely Syria would agree to share any of the water with Israel.

Eitan stressed, however, that it is not clear if the reports are correct and, if they are, what had prompted Jordan and Syria to initiate the proposal.

"I don't know if there is anything in what has been reported and published, and I don't know if they are going to actually carry out the work on this joint dam," Eitan told Israel Radio.

"If it does go ahead, however, or this trend does appear to be correct, it would be contrary to all the water agreements since the Johnston Accord in the early 1950s."

Eitan noted that the water issue will be one of the key issues in peace talks with Syria, if or when they resume.

National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon issued a statement saying he "is not familiar with the agreement between Syria and Jordan and would not relate to the facts and numbers published in the media.

"I want to think that the Jordanians, like us, honor agreements and that they intend, as we do, to fulfil their water agreements with Israel," he added.

The original report of the Yarmuk dam project was carried in a recent edition of a London-based Arabic newspaper. The paper quoted Jordanian sources as saying that Jordan had forwarded the proposal to Syria because of its disappointment with the implementation of the water agreements with Israel.

The report noted that Jordan and Syria had signed an accord a decade ago to jointly construct a dam and reservoir along the upper reaches of the Yarmuk, but it was never implemented due to lack of funds.

Watchmen tackle serious subject

By PAMELA CHELIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — At The Watchmen's recent performance at Lee's Palace here, lead singer Daniel Greaves entertained the crowd between songs with his jovial sense of humor.

But, at one point, Greaves grew particularly serious. "This next song is about a powerful subject," he said. "It's about a little girl who's not here anymore and the subject still gives me chills everytime I think about it."

That was the Winnipeg band's introduction to Shut-Up, a song Greaves was inspired to write after a visit to Amsterdam last year.

Though Greaves had read Anne Frank's diary, being in the room where the Frank family had hidden in terror had a great impact on him.

"What really got to me," he said after the show, "was seeing the pencil marks on the wall where her father would measure the kids' heights.

"And," he adds, "then I looked over to the window and that was the same window that she used to press her little nose against, hoping to one day be free."

While some have taken exception to the song's rather bold title, Greaves admits that he was originally reluctant to call it Shut-up, but he says it simply refers to Anne's tragic last moments of freedom, confined to a tiny room devoid of everything but fear.

The choice of song title, however, is a trivial matter. What is important is that Greaves wrote the song at all. It is rare for a mainstream pop/rock songwriter first to write about such a horrific piece of Jewish history, and second to be able to tackle it respectfully, but Greaves does so successfully.

He manages to capture the story's poignant details and in the limited three-minute span of a pop tune, he effectively guides you through Anne's journey from her hopeful beginning through to her painful end.

The Watchmen's Daniel Greaves was inspired to write Shut Up after visiting the house Anne Frank hid in. [Pamela Chelin photo]

The Watchmen are known for being able to write beautiful melodic songs, and Shut-Up is no exception. As the song begins, Greaves sings softly: "She's so in love with the great escape. It's all around her hopes and in her dreams ... she's living the best that she knows how." But, as the song develops, the music builds in intensity, effectively conveying Anne's terrifying awareness of her impending death.

Greaves voice, representing Anne's fear, gets increasingly louder as he reaches the lines: "She hears their boots and knows that her days are short and she'll die before she wakes," and by the end, Greaves is belting out the chorus.

Though Greaves says he did not intend to write the song to give a political message, Shut-Up is having an effect upon people and Greaves seems pleased to have reached them. People are talking about the song and consequently the Holocaust, and maybe some have even been inclined to once again pick up Anne's diary or to read it for the first time.

They say every little bit makes a difference and this time, The Watchmen did their little bit.

Devolopment Bank To Be Running By November

JERUSALEM – There are strong signs the Middle East development bank, originally conceived by Shimon Peres, will be up and running in time for the Cairo economic summit in November, according to senior Egyptian and Israeli officials.

During last week's two-day Cairo economic meeting attended by Egypt, Israel, Jordan and the Palestinian Authority, it was agreed to set up a transitional team by September to prepare for the bank's opening. The bank, to be located in Cairo, is meant to fund regional infrastructure and business projects.

Soviet Olim To Play Role

JERUSALEM – Immigrants from the former Soviet Union will be encouraged to play a major role in developing trade with their previous homeland, the Ministry of Industry and Trade said last week.

This will be one of the core means of increasing trade in the former Soviet Union. It was agreed that encouraging immigrants who understand the market to establish working relationships with the business community there will be of benefit to Israel.

Three key areas will be targeted, including short-term consumer goods, mid-term investment and technologies, and government level contacts.

Oman Opens Trade Office

JERUSALEM – Oman took another step toward developing trade relations with Israel last week when it inaugurated its trade office in Tel Aviv, three months after Israel opened a trade office in Muscat.

Jordan-Israel Trade Report

JERUSALEM – In the first six months of trade between Israel and Jordan, imports and exports were close to $2 million.

Israeli exports reached $1.2 million with imports fetching $0.68 million. The major exports were chemical products, textiles and mechanical machines. Israel purchased a similar range of goods from Jordan.

Anne Rice Dabbles In Hebrew & Occult

New Orleans novelist Anne Rice made a swing through Ottawa, Toronto and other Canadian cities last week as part of a North American tour to publicize her latest novel Servant Of The Bones (Knopf Canada, $32.95).

The author of 16 previous works that have sold 100 million copies, Rice is best known for her chilling and sympathetic portraits of vampires, mummies, witches and other horrific creatures unleashed upon the modern world. With Servant Of The Bones, she traces the centuries-old history of Azriel, a demonic-angelic ghost born as a Hebrew in Babylon at the time of the exile.

Azriel is a wealthy educated Jew who, at age 20, is plucked from death by evil priests and sorceresses and transformed into a genie. The story spans his perilous journey through time from Babylon's hanging gardens to the Europe of the Black Death to Manhattan in the 1990s.

Azriel is called forth just as a rich young lady, Esther Belkin, is killed in a Fifth Ave. department store.

Filled with occult lore, Servant Of The Bones is a fanciful narrative stew offering numerous discussions of Torah, the Holocaust and rabbinical matters as well as pagan and zoroastrian lore.

The golden dust-jacket is embossed with Romans expropriating the spoils of Jerusalem. Fans of Rice and the occult horror genre are sure to be enthralled.

Economic summit may not happen, Mubarak says

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The regional economic summit planned for Cairo in November may not take place unless Israel upholds its commitments to the Palestinians, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak told a gathering of academics in Alexandria lastThursday.

"I've told the Israelis that no progress in the peace process will hit the Middle East economic summit, because not many countries will attend," Mubarak said. He fell short, however, of saying that Egypt would cancel the event.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu phoned Mubarak Thursday night and pledged that there would be progress on the Palestinian track. Netanyahu's foreign policy adviser Dore Gold met with leading Palestinian negotiator Mahmoud Abbas in an attempt to make some progress on the outstanding issues.

Netanyahu's office issued a statement after the phone call, insisting that Netanyahu understood from Mubarak that the economic conference would take place.

Officials in Jerusalem said Cairo will be forced to back down from these threats under pressure from Washington. The officials noted that President Bill Clinton, who is facing an election campaign, will want to point to the planned summit as one of his administration's accomplishments.

Powerful images describe post war upheavals.

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A travelling exhibition, Light of Forgotten Stars, by Polish-born artist Anna Sper, reflects the artist's associations with her youth in post-Holocaust Poland.

Combining a variety of media and techniques with her knowledge of literature and art history and her personal reflections, Sper creates powerful images of cultural upheaval and the transitory nature of civilizations.

With an original process, Sper formed plaster heads cast from a single mould. By using different plasters, she created a series of expressive and haunting faces which stare out of a chilling blackness.

By photographing the heads, she presents a multitude of haunting images to be interpreted by the viewer. Her unusual technique produces three-dimensional photographs with varying degrees of darkness.

Sper says everyone sees something different in her art. "Japanese viewers have said that it makes them think of Hiroshima, while Jewish viewers relate it to the Holocaust."

Her goal, she said in an interview, is to raise awareness of the past. "The past is always with us and we are always influenced by the past even if we are not consciously thinking about it."

The exhibition, which was recently on view here, will soon be touring Europe and Israel.

Sper, who lives and works in Toronto, studied art at the Ontario College of Art and the Toronto School of Art. She studied literature at the Sorbonne in Paris and at the University of Toronto.

Flower growers protest

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Hundreds of flower-growers demonstrated on a busy Tel Aviv corner last week to protest what they said was a government plan to cut subsidies in their industry.

The demonstrators passed out roses and sunflowers to pedestrians and also threw flowers into the street.

The secretary of the Flower-growers Association said the industry is responsible for some $200 million (US) in exports annually.

They said the industry would collapse if state subsidies were cut.

JERUSALEM – The number of tourists arriving here by air in March and April was 20 percent lower than in the January- February period, according to Central Bureau of Statistics figures published last Thursday.

In May and June, the number of tourists dropped another seven percent.

The drop in tourism was attributed in part to the terrorist bombings in February and March and to Operation Grapes of Wrath.

The Inside Back

About life

Dear Ella,

With fall just around the corner, we can expect the cold and flu season to follow.

I work with a gentleman who is a very dedicated employee. He works late, he works on weekends, comes in on his holidays and when he is sick.

I give him credit for the sacrifices he makes for this company. However I do not appreciate working with someone who is ill.

I am a full-time working mother and housewife with two young children. I also have elderly parents that I look after. I can't afford to get sick. I know it is unavoidable sometimes, but when I come to work and find this fellow on my telephone, at my desk sneezing and hacking, I see red.

I have tried to mention in a nonchalant way that he should have stayed home, but the man doesn't take a hint very well. He snickers as if I were joking and keeps right on working.

Do you have any suggestions for me before the germs hit the fan?

"Cold" Shoulder

Dear "Cold" Shoulder,

I think this subject is a bone of contention in many work places. Common sense and courtesy have to play a role here.

There are different degrees of "sick." Living in Canada, many of us have come to accept walking around with a cold from time to time. Some people will feel very ill at the slightest sniffle and then there are others who can walk around with a fever and not be too bothered by it.

Nobody ever wants to get sick and obviously there are steps you can take to avoid contact with sick people, however, when you work in close quarters, sometimes it is inevitable that a colleague will come in sick.

Take your fellow worker aside and with a serious demeanor tell him you need to have a talk. This should spark his attention enough for him to listen to you seriously. In a polite but firm way explain to him your concern about getting sick. Ask him to stay off your phone and away from your work area and to please cover up when he sneezes or coughs. I think you will get a different reaction. You may even make him think he really should be at home. But don't hold your breath or maybe you should!

PUFF PASTRY TORTE

THIS RECIPE BROUGHT TO YOU BY...

HERB CAPLAN SELLS FOR LESS
1111 Weston Road (S. of Eglinton) 767-1655

A WONDERFUL YOM TOV LUNCHEON DISH!

1 large onion, chopped
1 garlic clove, minced
1 tblsp. butter
2 pkgs. frozen spinach
1 pkg. frozen puff pastry
6.5 oz can tuna or 1/4-1/2 lb.smoked salmon
1 lb. mozarella cheese, grated
1 jar roasted red peppers
7 eggs

Preheat oven to 350°F. Sauté onions and garlic in butter, add spinach. Cook until wilted, then drain well. Roll 2/3 of the puff pastry into a 9 inch (23 cm) springform pan. Pastry will overhang edges. Layer half the tuna, half the cheese, half the spinach, and half the red pepper. Beat 6 eggs and pour over. Repeat layers. Roll remaining third of the pastry and top it. Seal edges with water. Coat top with last egg (beaten) and bake 45 minutes. Release the pan ring to serve. Garnish the platter with thin red pepper rings and shredded spinach leaves.

Diplomatically Speaking

BY JEHUDI KINAR

I have been in Toronto almost a year now, and during my time here, the print and electronic media have been reporting extensively on the Middle East.

Looking back on this period, I would like to express some of my thoughts on the way the general media have dealt with Israel. However, I will not go into great detail and will abstain from mentioning the specific names of journalists and media people connected with the different media outlets.

When I first arrived in Toronto, my colleagues and new-found friends and acquaintances told me how lucky I was to have arrived at a time when the media were so friendly toward Israel. As they described the harsh criticism meted out against Israel over the years (especially during the intifadah), I thought that their description of the situation four or five years ago must have been exaggerated.

I lost my innocence, however, after experiencing the intense media coverage given to the new government in Israel. And it is now clear to me that not all Canadian journalists are handling issues concerning the Middle East with fairness and balance.

Prior to the recent Israeli elections, for instance, several journalists and media outlets took it upon themselves to make recommendations to the Israeli public on which prime ministerial candidate to vote for. Such a paternalistic attitude is surprising, especially from Canadian media outlets known for their support of democracy. One can only suppose that Canada's proud and independent media would happily welcome similar advice to Canadians by American and other editorialists. Or would they?

In the aftermath of the Israeli elections some journalists (the radio and TV journalists in particular), did indeed provide their audiences with relatively accurate and fair reports on the make-up of the government and the prime minister's trips abroad. But too often developments affecting the new government were portrayed by some print journalists in a very negative light — often in harsher terms than those used by Yasser Arafat or Hafez al-Assad themselves.

One newspaper reporter went so far as to infer disaster from Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak's stiff body language at his press conference with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. Perhaps Mubarak was stiff from engaging in some vigorous physical activity the day before! Most other reporters saw the meeting for what it was — a positive step toward reinforcing the pursuit of peace.

Another commentator who "worried" about Netanyahu "leading Israel into isolation" seemed to have done very intensive research on settlements in the territories. His column referred to the expansion of settlements "already happening in Bethlehem." This assertion is especially astonishing considering that there are no Jewish settlements in Bethlehem. Furthermore, the city is the domain of the Palestinian Authority rather than in Israel.

My biggest surprise was over the criticism which Netanyahu received for his calls for democracy in the Arab world. Who would expect such a negative attitude, when most Canadian papers at one point or another have written editorials advocating democracy in Nigeria, Russia, Indonesia or elsewhere?

Netanyahu's call for reciprocity in fulfiling treaty obligation received similar media ridicule. This is especially strange in Canada, a country that has such a deep respect for international treaty obligations and the rule of law. Why shouldn't Israel's peace partners be held accountable, as Israel is, for fulfilment of their international treaty obligations?

And even a relatively small protest by religious Jews demanding the Shabbat closing of Bar Ilan Road in Jerusalem (a controversy which has been around for years) was sensationalized on the front page of one Canadian newspaper. The headline in this paper even gave the impression that the protest involved a clash between Israelis and Palestinians.

While these are only a few examples, it is unfortunate that not all journalists writing for the influential Canadian media rise to high standards of journalistic integrity when dealing with issues concerning Israel and the Middle East.
